HINDU FAMILY LAW.

INTRODUCTION.

HINDU law, as the term is understood by British administrators of justice, consists of the rules of law which are believed to have been generally binding on Hindus in matters to which they relate,¹ at the time of the commencement of the British dominion, with such variations as have been made by British legislation, or by the established custom of any tribe, caste, family, or locality.

What is Hindu law?

Sir H. S. Maine says:²—

“Indian³ law may be in fact affirmed to consist of a very great number of local bodies of usage, and of one set of customs reduced to writing, pretending to a diviner authority than the rest,⁴ exercising consequently a great influence over them, and tending, if not checked, to absorb them. You must not understand that these bodies of custom are fundamentally distinct. They are all marked by the same general features; but there are considerable differences of detail.”

To use the words of a learned Brahmin judge of the High Court of Bengal,⁵ “Hindu law is a body of rules intimately mixed up with religion, and it was originally administered for the most part by private tribunals. The system was highly elastic, and had been gradually growing up by the assimilation of new usages and the modification of ancient text law under the guise of interpretation, when its spontaneous growth was suddenly arrested by the administration of the country passing into the hands of the English, and a degree of rigidity was given to it which it never before possessed.”⁶

In three matters Hindu law differs from other systems of law, viz. in the family law, which arises from what is called by English lawyers the joint family system; secondly, in the law of adoption; and thirdly, in the law of succession and inheritance.

Throughout British India, questions relating to the succession, inheritance, and marriage of Hindus, to caste, and to Hindu religious usages or institutions, are decided according to Hindu law.¹

Although there is a variation in their language, the several enactments, which prescribe the law to be administered in the Courts established in British India, are in substantial agreement in making this provision.

The following is a list of such enactments—

The High Court of Bengal, in the exercise of its ordinary original civil jurisdiction.

The High Court of Madras in the exercise of its ordinary original civil jurisdiction.

The High Court of Bombay in the exercise of its ordinary original civil jurisdiction.

21 Geo. III. c. 70, s. 17, read with the Letters Patent, 1862, s. 18, and the Letters Patent, 1865, s. 19.

37 Geo. III. c. 142, s. 13, read with 40 Geo. III. c. 79, s. 5, and Letters Patent, 1862, s. 18.

37 Geo. III. c. 142, s. 13, read with 4 Geo. IV. c. 71, s. 9.²

There is in the above enactments no express reference to questions of marriage, caste, or religious usages and institutions, but the Supreme in the maturity of life, the rule of native law dissolved and, with or without his intention, was to a great extent replaced by rules having their origin in English law books. Under the hand of the judges of the Sudder Courts, who had lived since their boyhood among the people of the country, the native rules hardened, and contracted a rigidity which they never had in real practice." See article by Mr. Justice Nair of Madras in Contemporary Review for May, 1906.

² See Mathura Naikin v. Esu Naikin (1880), 4 Bom. 545, at p. 556.

Courts and High Courts have always dealt with such questions according to the personal law of the individuals concerned.¹

The Presidency Small Cause Courts have to determine all questions according to the law administered by the High Courts in the exercise of their ordinary original civil jurisdiction.²

Punjab.

This enactment describes the topics of Hindu law to be dealt with by the Courts as "succession, special property of females, betrothal, marriage, divorce, dower, adoption, guardianship,³ minority,⁴ bastardy, family relations, wills, legacies, gifts, partitions, or any religious usage or institution." Although this description is more detailed than is to

The Central Provinces.—Act XX. of 1875, s. 5.

In this enactment the topics of Hindu and Mahomedan law are described in the same way as for the Punjab, except that “divorce” is not included. In the few Hindu cases in which the question of divorce arises,¹ the question would probably be held to be included in the expression “marriage.”

Caste and religious usages.

Questions of caste and of religious usages and institutions can only be determined by the Civil Courts where their determination is necessary for the purpose of deciding a suit “of a civil nature.”

A suit in which the rights to property or to an office is contested is a suit of a civil nature, notwithstanding that such right may depend entirely on the decision of questions as to religious rites or ceremonies.³

In the Bombay Presidency (outside the Island of Bombay) the Courts are prohibited from deciding caste questions, except in a suit instituted for the recovery of damages on account of an alleged injury to the caste and character of the plaintiff, arising from some illegal act or unjustifiable conduct of the other party.⁴

The High Courts of Bengal, Madras, and Bombay, in the exercise of their ordinary original civil jurisdiction, are also required to administer the Hindu law in all matters of contract and dealing between Hindus, except where such matters have been the subject of legislative enactment.

Contracts and • dealings.

So far as it goes, the Indian Contract Act¹ has superseded the Hindu law of contracts;² but it may sometimes be necessary to refer to Hindu law as to matters of contract or dealing. For instance, the Hindu law of gifts is to some extent still applied to gifts by Hindus, and it has been held that the law of dāndupat, by which no greater arrear of interest can be recovered at any one time than what will amount to the principal sum, applies to the Presidency towns.³

In some of the enactments above referred to the Courts are required to administer the Hindu law only in cases where the defendant is a Hindu,⁴ and in some of them in cases where the parties are Hindus. In either case the question as to whether the Hindu law is to be applied depends rather upon whether the person whose inheritance, succession, etc., is in dispute was a Hindu, or the persons, whose dealing is in question, were Hindus, rather than upon the accident of the arrangement of the parties in the litigation.⁵

SOURCES OF HINDU LAW.

Hindu law.

Although in theory Hindu law is ultimately based upon the Vedas, which are said to have been of Divine origin, in matters of law the Vedas are of no greater authority than the Smritis (things heard by the Rishis, or sages of antiquity), or codes of revealed law. For all practical purposes it is unnecessary to trace the law earlier than the *Dharma*¹ Sastras,² which expression, although comprehending both the Vedas and the Smritis, is technically used to refer only to the Smritis.³

In modern practice the Dharma Sastras are of less authority than the Commentaries and Digests, which are based upon them, and the views expressed in the Commentaries and Digests in their place give way to the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and of the High Courts of British India.

The Sastras.

The principal Codes or Sanhitas constituting the *Dharma Sastras*⁴ are—

1. The Code or Institutes of Manu.

This is undoubtedly the most important of the Dharma Sastras. Its authorship is unknown, and there is great uncertainty as to its age. It was translated by Sir William Jones, who considered it was written in the thirteenth century B.C. Other authorities have placed it much later, Max Müller going so far as to consider that the work was composed not earlier than the second century B.C.

2. The Code or Institutes of Yajnavalkya.

This code is second in importance to that of Manu. It was apparently written in one of the early centuries of the Christian era. The *Mitakshara*⁵ is a commentary upon this code.

provisions above mentioned, ante, pp. 2-4.

⁵ Post, p. 11.

3. The Code or Institutes of Narada.

The translator (Dr. Jolly) of this code fixes its earliest possible date at about 400 or 500 A.D.

The next step in the development of Hindu law consisted in the composition of a number of Commentaries and Digests based upon the Smritis. Commentaries and Digests.

The authority of the several commentators necessarily varied in different districts, and thus arose the schools of law, which are operative in different parts of India.¹

The differences between these schools are said to have arisen in the main from the different views expressed by the commentators who were of authority in the districts which were governed by the schools respectively. Difference of the custom of districts may also have helped to differentiate the schools both directly and indirectly by influencing the opinions of the commentators.

The two principal schools² of Hindu law are—

1. The Mitakshara³ school, which prevails throughout India, except where the Bengal school prevails. Principal schools of Hindu law.

This is the orthodox system of Hindu law.

¹ See Collector of Madura v. Mootoo Ramalingu Sathupathy (1868), 12 M. I. A., 397, at p. 435; 1 B. L. R. P. C. 1, at p. 11; 10 W. R. P. C. 17, at p. 21; G. D. Banerjee's "Law of Marriage," 2nd ed., p. 5. H. T. Colebrooke (Strange's "Hindu Law," i. p. 316) says, "The written law, whether it be Sruti or Smriti, direct revelation or tradition, is subject to the same rules of interpretation. These rules are collected in the Mimamsa, which is a disquisition on proof and authority of precepts. It is considered as a branch of philosophy; and is properly the logic of the law. In the eastern part of India, viz. Bengal and Bahar, where the Vedas are less read, and the Minansa less studied than in the south, the dialectic philosophy, or Nyaya, is more consulted, and is there relied on for rules of reasoning and interpretation on questions of law, as well as upon metaphysical topics." Dr. Jogendranath Bhattacharya ("Hindu Law," 2nd ed., pp. 28, 29) considers that the Commentaries and Digests were the outcome of a desire to reconcile the Smritis at the time when Brahminism had regained its ascendancy.

³ So named after the treatise by Vijnaneshvara (post, p. 11), which is of authority throughout India, except where superseded by other works in Bengal and Western India.

2. The Bengal or Daya-bhaga¹ school, which prevails where the Bengal language is spoken by the inhabitants of the country.²

This school was founded by Jimutavahana³ and Raghunandana⁴ in the fifteenth century.

Subdivision of

The Mitakshara school is subdivided into four minor schools, viz.—

1. The Benares school.

This school prevails in Behar, in the district of Benares, and in Central and North-western India, and in the whole of Northern India,⁵ except that in the Punjab it is considerably modified by customary law.

2. The Dravida or Dravira school.

This school prevails in the Madras Presidency, i.e. in the southern portion of the peninsula. It was founded in the thirteenth century by Devananda Bhatta.⁶

⁵ Orissa is said, in Morley's "Digest" (Introduction, p. cxc.), to be governed by this school. In a note to Bishen-pirca Mune v. Soogunda (Rane) (1801), 1 Ben. Sel. R. 37, at p. 39, note (2nd ed., 49, at p. 51, note), Mr. Macnaghten states that "the authorities followed in Orissa are the same with those of Bengal"; but the opinions of the pundits in this case were not founded on Bengal authorities, and as Mr. Mayne points out (7th ed., p. 11, note), in another Orissa case mentioned in Macnaghten's "Hindu Law," ii. 306, the opinion of the pundits was founded on the Mitakshara. In Raghunadha (Sri) v. Brozo Kishoro (Sri) (1876), 3 I. A. 154; 1 Mad. 69; 25 W. R. C. R. 291, which was a case from Ganjam, which was included in the ancient Hindu kingdom of Orissa, the law of the Dravida school was applied apparently without question. Mr. Mayne ("Hindu Law," 7th ed., p. 11) suggests that the Court applied the system of law with which it was most familiar. In Raghunund Doss v. Sudhu Churn Doss (1878), 4 Calc. 425; 3 C. L. R. 534, the Mitakshara law was applied to a case from Orissa. See also Kalee Pudo Banerjee v. Choitun Pandah (1874), 22 W. R. C. R. 214; Jogendra Bhupati Hurri Chundun Muhapatra (Raja) v. Nityanund Mansingh (1890), 17 I. A. 128; 18 Calc. 151. In Parbati Kumari Debi (Srimati Rani) v. Jagadis Chunder Dhabal (1902), 29 I. A. 82; 29 Calc. 432; 6 C. W. N. 490 the decision of the Court in India showed that Orissa was governed by the Mitakshara, but the question was not decided by the Judicial Committee.

⁶ Post, p. 12. See Collector of Maduru v. Mooltoo Ramalinga Sathupathy (1868), 12 M. I. A. 397, at p. 433; 1 B. L. R. P. C. 1, at p. 10; 10 W. R. P. C. 17, at p. 20.

Mr. Morley¹ says that the Dravida school "may be subdivided into three districts, in each of which some particular law treatises have more weight than others; these districts are: Drávida, properly so called,² Karnátaka,³ and Andhra."⁴

3. The Maharashtra school.

This school prevails where the Mahratta language is spoken as a vernacular.

4. The Mithila school.

This school prevails in what was in ancient times the Province of Mithila, or Tirhoot,⁵ and in the adjoining districts. It was founded by Chandeshwar, 1314 A.D., and Vachaspati Misra, who flourished in the fifteenth century.⁶

Sastri Golap Chunder Sircar⁷ adds to this enumeration a school which he calls the Punjab School. This school is not recognized by other text writers, and is not referred to in the authorities by that name. There may be many differences between the Hindu law as administered in the Punjab and that which is administered in the other provinces, but such differences arise from the existence of local customs, upon which the law is there based,⁸ and do not, as in the case of the other schools⁹ arise from differences of opinion as to the true construction of texts.

The geographical limits of these schools cannot be accurately defined.¹⁰ Where there is a dispute as to which school prevails in a particular locality the question must be determined upon evidence.

The redistribution of districts or other arbitrary divisions of land by the Government does not render the inhabitants of the locality dealt with liable to be subject to a different school of law.¹¹

authority,
Bengal school.

The following are the principal works of authority in the Bengal School :¹—

1. Daya-bhaga,² by Jimutavahana.

Nothing is known of the author. He probably lived in Bengal in the fifteenth century.³ This work was translated by Mr. H. T. Colebrooke. It is the highest authority in Bengal.⁴

2. Raghunandana's Smritis.

This author is said to be of the highest authority in Bengal except in matters of inheritance.⁵ The portion of the work relating to inheritance (Dayatattwa) in general strictly follows the Daya-bhaga. Raghunandana seems to have flourished in the latter half of the fifteenth century or beginning of the sixteenth century.⁶

3. Daya-krama Sangraha, by Sree Krishna Tarkalankar.

This is a treatise on the law of inheritance, following the Daya-bhaga, and apparently written early in the eighteenth century. It was translated by Mr. P. M. Wynch in 1818.

4. Srikrishna's Commentary. A commentary on the Daya-bhaga, by the last-named writer.

5. Dattaka Chandrika. A treatise on the law of adoption.

The translator (Mr. Sutherland) ascribed the authorship of this work to Devanda Bhatta, the author of the "Smriti Chandrika,"⁷ but it is now taken to be the work of a Bengal Pundit.⁸ It has been suggested that this work was forged for the purpose of a particular suit,⁹ but the (Mussumut) v. Pirthee Singh (1872), 21 W. R. C. R. 891. The judgment of the Judicial Committee seems to show that the burden was upon the person asserting the retention of the law originally applicable to the district, but this view of the judgment was not suggested in the judgment on the High Court on remand, nor was it referred to when the case came again before the Judicial Committee (Sheo Soondary v. Pirthee Singh (1877), 4 I. A. 147).

Judicial Committee has treated the "Dattaka Chandrika" as of great authority in questions of adoption in Bengal.¹

The Mitakshara is also of high authority in Bengal in matters where it does not conflict with the above-named works.²

In the Mitakshara school the guiding authority³ is the work from which the name of the school has been taken, viz. the Mitakshara, which is a commentary on Yajñovalkya,⁴ by Vijnaneshwara Jogi. Mitakshara school.

The author is said to have lived at the end of the eleventh century. "Vijnaneshwara's views and opinions are eminently practical. The high authority which his work enjoys almost throughout India is due partly to that reason and partly also to the fact that he was the councillor of the most powerful Hindu king of his time."⁵ He lived at Kalyāna (probably the modern Kalyāni in the Nizam's dominions), which was the capital of Vikramāditya VI., or Vikramanka, king of the Chalukya kingdom of the Deccan from 1076 for about half a century.⁶

The schools, which are subdivisions of the Mitakshara school, give preference to certain treatises and commentaries which control and explain passages of the Mitakshara. Thus arise the differences between those subdivisions.⁷

Where there is no consensus of opinion among the commentators or established usage, the doctrines of the Mitakshara prevail.⁸

1. Vira Mitrodaya.²

This work was written by Mitra Misra, who probably lived in the sixteenth century, for the purpose of refuting the arguments of Jimuta Vahana³ and the other writers of the Bengal school.⁴

The Vira Mitrodaya is of very high authority in the Benares school,⁵ but cannot be followed where it conflicts with a clear statement in the Mitakshara.⁶

2. Nirnaya Sindhu.

This work was written by Kamalakara, and was completed in 1612 A.D.

3. Dattaka Mimansa.

This is a treatise on adoption by Nanda Pandita, who lived at Benares in the seventeenth century. It has been translated by Mr. Sutherland. The authority of this work has been emphasized by the Judicial Committee on more than one occasion.⁷

Dravida school.

The author lived in Southern India about the thirteenth century.⁹ The authority of this work is second only to that of the Mitakshara.¹⁰ It has been translated by T. Kristnasawmy Iyer.

This is a commentary on the Parasara Smriti by Madhava, who was Prime Minister of Bukka, the third King of Vijayanagara, whose reign commenced about 1361. It is said to be "in high esteem in Benares and in the Southern and Western schools."¹

3. Sarasvati Vilasa.²

This work was written by Pratapa Rudra Deva, a King of Orissa, early in the sixteenth century. It has been translated by Mr. Foulkes.

4. Vyavahara Nirnaya.

This was written by Varadaraja about the end of the sixteenth century. It has been translated by Dr. Burnell.

5. Dattaka Chandrika.³

The application of this work to Southern India is said to have been due to a mistake made by the translator in attributing the authorship to the author of the Smriti Chandrika; ⁴ but as it has been treated by the Judicial Committee as an authority in Southern India,⁵ the effect of this mistake, if it be one, cannot be altered.

The Judicial Committee has also affirmed the Vira Mitrodaya ⁶ to be a work of authority in Southern India,⁷ but it is submitted that that work is only of secondary authority elsewhere than in Benares.⁸

This work was written by Vachaspati Misra, who flourished in Tirhoot in the beginning of the fifteenth century. It is the work of highest authority in this school. It has been translated by Prosono Coomar Tagore.

The Vyavahara Chintamani and the Dwaita Nirnaya, both by the author of the Vivada Chintamani are also authorities in the Mithila country.

2. Vivada Ratnakara.

This is an older compilation, but of less authority than the Vivada Chintamani. The writer was Chandesvara Thakkura, Prime Minister of Hara Sinha Deva, King of Mithila. He flourished at the end of the thirteenth or beginning of the fourteenth century. This work has recently been translated by G. C. Sircar and Digamvar Chatterjee.

3. Dattaka Mimansa.¹

Sudhiviveka, by Rudradhara, Dwaita Parishista, by Keshav Misra,² and Vivada Chandra, by Lachmadevi,³ are also authorities in this school.

The Bengal and the Mitakshara systems differ in two main particulars,⁴ viz.—

Differences
schools.

1. As to the persons who are coparceners, and their rights, as such, in property held in coparcenary, i.e. as a joint Hindu family.

Under the Mitakshara system rights in family property are acquired by birth and lapse by death.⁵ In Bengal, rights in joint property are acquired by inheritance or will. In consequence of this difference, the law as to the power to alienate differs under the two systems.

2. As to inheritance.

The Mitakshara system prefers agnates to cognates generally. The Bengal school founds rights of inheritance upon the principle of the amount of religious efficacy which the person claiming can give by an offering to the manes of the person, whose property is in dispute, or of his ancestor.

⁵ Post, pp. 231, 243, 244.

The subdivisions of the Mitakshara school differ between themselves, and from the Bengal school, as to the right of a widow to adopt a son to her deceased husband,¹ and in certain other matters connected with adoption. They also differ in some questions of inheritance.

The Maharashtra school differs from all other schools in conferring rights of inheritance upon certain female relations, and in giving greater powers to female owners.

Decisions of Courts of Law.

The decisions of English Courts of law have played a considerable part in ascertaining, developing, and sometimes in crystallizing Hindu law. The Courts in India necessarily follow without question the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and of the High Courts, if any, to which they are subordinate. Now that the volume of reported decisions upon questions of Hindu law has become so large, judicial decisions, in most cases, provide an answer to the questions which arise.

Legislative enactments.

By the following enactments the Legislature has made some alterations in those portions of the Hindu law which the Courts are required to administer :—

1. Act XXI. of 1850 (Freedom of Religion).
2. Act XV. of 1856 (Hindu widows remarriage).
3. Act VII. (Bom. C.) of 1866 (Hindus liability for ancestor's debts).
4. Act XXI. of 1870 (Hindu wills).
5. Act. IX. of 1872 (Contracts).²
6. Act IX. of 1875 (Majority).
7. Act IV. of 1882 (Transfer of Property).
8. Act III. (B. C.) of 1904 (Settled Estates Act).

TO WHOM HINDU LAW IS APPLICABLE.

To what persons Hindu law is applicable.

The expression "Hindus," in the enactments above referred to, includes not only persons who profess what is called the Hindu religion,³ but also such of their descendants as have not openly abjured that religion.⁴

"In doubtful cases conformity to the manners and observances of the Hindus is a safe guide for concluding that a particular family is to be governed by the Hindu law."¹

Hindus are divided into the following four main divisions, or, as they are usually called, "castes"²:—

1. The Brahmins, or priestly caste.
2. The Kshatriyas, or warrior caste.³
3. The Vaisyas, or agricultural caste.
4. The Sudras.

When caste first originated in the Epic Age, the pure Hindus were members of the first three of these divisions, and the members of those divisions are now styled regenerate, or twice-born, having regard to the ceremonies of initiation which are peculiar to them. Each of these castes is now divided into a number of sub-castes. In the case of the Sudras nearly every occupation has its caste.

In the absence of a special custom, Hindu law is applied to Jains⁴ and to Sikhs.⁵ Jains and Sikhs.

Degradation from caste,⁶ or a departure from orthodoxy in the matter of diet or ceremonial,⁷ does not prevent the application of Hindu law. Loss of caste.

Except so far as the Hindu law may be inconsistent Change of religion.

The illegitimate children of Hindu parents are within the expression "Hindus." Illegitimate children.

It has been held that the illegitimate children of a Hindu mother by a European father are to be treated as Hindus, if they have been brought up as such,³ but there is authority that where the mother is a non-Hindu the children cannot be treated as Hindus, even though the father is a Hindu.⁴

The Indian Succession Act⁵ has brought under its provisions all native Christians, whether they have or have not elected to remain subject to the Hindu law,⁶ but does not affect rights of survivorship to coparcenary property.⁷ Native Christians.

The mere circumstance that a man calls himself a Hindu is not sufficient to entitle him to the application of Hindu law,⁸ but in some cases, where the parties have followed the rules of Hindu law, that law may be applied as a rule of equity and good conscience.⁹ Profession of Hinduism.

As the Hindu law is a personal law, a Hindu is presumed to be governed by the school of law which governs the locality in which he resides.¹⁰ Who are governed by particular schools of law.

If a Hindu migrates from one part of the country to another, the presumption is that he retains the laws and customs as to succession and family relations prevailing in Families governed by law of origin.

CUSTOM.

In administering the Hindu law, the Courts are required Custom. to give effect to a custom, i.e. to a rule which in a particular family⁴ or in a particular caste or class,⁵ or in a particular district,⁶ has from long usage obtained the force of law.⁷

The reason for this decision was that from the dates mentioned the powers of making laws were vested in the British Legislature. Sir G. D. Banerjee ("Law of Marriage," 2nd ed., p. 224), questions the correctness of the above-mentioned decision of Grey, C.J., and adds, "We may at any rate fairly say, that in the Hindu law, not only is it unnecessary to trace back the existence of a custom to any definite date, but even the indefinite condition of being ancient may, in favour of some classes of customs, have to be dispensed with."

professed to define the expression "ancient." That expression is apparently coincident with the expression "from time immemorial."¹

"What the law requires before an alleged custom can receive the recognition of the Court and so acquire legal force is, satisfactory proof of usage so long and invariably acted upon in practice as to show that it has by common consent been submitted to as the established governing rule of the particular family, class, or district of country."² Such proof raises a presumption that the usage was an ancient one.³

ance of custom.

So far as continuity is concerned there seems to be a distinction between a family custom and a local custom. In the former case it is competent to the family to discontinue the custom, or it may have been accidentally discontinued.⁴ In the latter case the omission of individuals to follow the custom could not have the effect of destroying it, as it is a part of the lex loci, and binds all persons within the local limits in which it prevails.⁵

When the custom has been proved the burden is upon the party alleging the discontinuance to prove that fact.⁶

New grant of property
partible.

A family custom that property should remain impartible, is not necessarily destroyed by a new grant being made by the Government to a member of the family,⁷ but where a new tenure is created, and there is nothing in the circumstances under which the new grant was made to lead to the inference that the Government had in view in making the new grant the creation of an impartible zemindari as an exception to the ordinary rule of the Hindu law, the ordinary rules of Hindu law apply.⁸

A family custom is personal, and does not apply to subsequent owners of the land held by the family.¹

The following are illustrations of customs which have been held void Immorality.

A custom allowing a woman to remarry during the lifetime of her husband and without his consent.²

A custom for dancing-girls to adopt daughters under circumstances which would amount to a traffic in minors as prohibited by ss. 372 and 373 of the Indian Penal Code;³ but except where the recognition of the rights alleged would countenance such a traffic, or the usage is in itself immoral,⁴ the Courts will give effect to the rights of dancing-girls attached to Hindu temples in respect of endowments for their support,⁵ and also to the peculiar usages of the dancing-girl and prostitute classes with regard to adoption⁶ and succession.⁷

A custom will not be applied unless those following the custom are convinced in conscience that they are acting in accordance with law.⁸

Judicial recognition is not a condition precedent to the validity of a custom,⁹ but such recognition may be of great value as evidence of the existence of that custom.¹⁰ Judicial recognition.

In the case of persons governed generally by the Hindu law, the burden of proving a custom derogatory to that law lies upon the person who asserts it.¹¹ Burden of proof of custom.

CHAPTER I.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

MARRIAGE.

THE relationship of husband and wife is created by a marriage, entered into by two persons, who are each competent, according to Hindu law, to enter into the state of marriage,¹ and who are not debarred by that law from intermarrying,² such marriage being performed with the ceremonies prescribed by that law.³

According to Hindu ideas, marriage has for its object the performance of religious duties. It is a sanskara, that is, an essential ceremony, held indispensable to constitute the perfect purification of a Hindu.⁴ It is the last of the ten sanskars necessary for the regeneration of males of the twice-born classes,⁵ and is the only one prescribed for women and for Sudras.⁶

Marriage is essential to a Hindu in order that by begetting a son he may be delivered from the hell called put, to which the shades of a sonless man are, according to Hindu ideas, doomed,⁷ that he may repay the debt he owes to his forefathers,⁸ and that he may be able to perform some of the most important religious acts.⁹

It is the imperative religious duty of a father, or other guardian,¹⁰ to cause a girl to be married, before she attains puberty, to a suitable husband, capable of procreating children.¹

Duty of guardian of boy.

Although the law permits the marriage of boys who have not attained majority,² such marriages do not seem to have been contemplated by the sages and early writers on Hindu law.³ There is not, therefore, any moral or religious obligation upon a parent, or other guardian, to provide a wife for a boy, although there may be a right to provide for his marriage.⁴

WHO MAY MARRY.

Who are competent to marry.

Unless expressly prohibited by a provision of the Hindu law, any male Hindu is competent to marry, and every unmarried Hindu female is competent to be given in marriage.⁵

The Hindu law regards the bridegroom as the person who marries, and the bride as the person who is taken in marriage.⁶

Defects.

Physical and mental defects, even if they be such as to cause exclusion from inheritance,⁷ do not invalidate a marriage.⁸

Lunacy.

Unsoundness of mind does not invalidate a marriage.

Pundits both in Bengal⁹ and Bombay¹⁰ have given opinions that it does not invalidate a marriage. Sir G. D. Banerjee points out that "there are indications in the law from which it would appear that lunatics are considered competent to marry,"¹ but he also says² that, as a lunatic is incompetent to accept the gift of a bride, it is not easy to understand how his marriage can be regarded as marriage at all.

The ancient authorities permitted a eunuch to marry on the ground Impotence. that his wife could raise up a son to him by a man legally appointed,³ but now that the system of *niyoga*⁴ is obsolete, it may be a question whether the Courts will not declare the marriage of an impotent person to be void.⁵

Except that in the case of the twice-born classes Age for marriage. marriage cannot take place before investiture with the sacred thread,⁶ a male Hindu of any age can marry.⁷

A female Hindu of any age can be given in marriage.⁸

The Hindu religion requires a girl to be given in marriage before she attains the age of puberty,⁹ but there is nothing in the Hindu law to invalidate the marriage of a woman who has attained puberty.¹⁰

As to the necessity for the consent of a guardian in the case of the marriage of minors, see post, pp. 41-46.

No effect can be given to an agreement purporting to avoid a marriage on the taking of a second wife during the lifetime of the first,¹ and apparently an agreement not to enter into such second marriage would be against the policy of the Hindu law.²

Contracting a second marriage during the lifetime of the wife is called adhivedana, or supersession, but does not in any way imply that the first wife is deserted.³

The Hindu writers prescribe that a present (adhivedanika) should be given to the wife as compensation for her supersession, but they do not agree as to the amount.⁴ Such compensation could not apparently be claimed in a court of law.

Christian.

A Hindu, who has become a Christian, cannot take to himself another wife while his wife is alive.⁵

Bigamy of women.

A woman cannot marry another man while her husband is alive.⁶

Although the Courts will not recognize a custom which permits a wife at her pleasure to desert her husband and marry another man,⁷ at any rate where the first husband did not consent to the second marriage,⁸ it would apparently give effect to a custom permitting such remarriage on desertion by the husband.⁹ A custom authorizing such remarriage in case of the husband's leprosy might also be valid.¹ No effect could be given to the decision of a panchayet or of a caste which authorizes a remarriage,² except, perhaps, where by custom a valid divorce could be effected by such decision.³

Where divorce is permissible by custom,⁴ or where a divorce has been decreed under Act XXI. of 1866,⁵ a woman can remarry.

The marriage of a girl, who has been betrothed⁶ (but not married) to another man, is valid.⁷

A widow can remarry.⁸

Remarriage after divorce.
Betrothed girl.
Remarriage of widow.

Except in the case of a special custom⁹ the remarriage of widows was prohibited by the Hindu law, which was in force at the time of the passing of Act XV. of 1856.¹⁰

Act XV. of 1856, which empowers Hindu widows to remarry, provides as follows¹¹—

"All rights and interests which any widow may have in her deceased husband's property by way of maintenance, or by inheritance to her husband or to his lineal successors,¹² or by virtue of any will or testamentary disposition conferring upon her, without express permission to remarry, only a limited interest in such property, with no power of alienating the same, shall, upon her remarriage,¹³ cease and determine, as if she had then died, and the next heirs of her deceased husband, or other persons entitled to the property on her death, shall thereupon succeed to the same."

A widow does not by remarriage lose her rights to succeed thereafter to her son or other lineal successor of her husband.¹

There is a conflict of opinion as to whether the above section has any application to the case of widows, who are by the custom of their caste entitled to remarry. The Allahabad High Court² considers that it has no such application, but the High Courts at Calcutta,³ Madras,⁴ and Bombay⁵ have taken the opposite view.

injunctions.

The Hindu law placed certain restrictions upon marriage by rules, which are now treated as operating only as moral injunctions.

Impurity arising from the birth or death of a relation was treated as a disqualification.⁶

The marriage of a younger brother before an elder brother,⁷ or of a younger sister before an elder sister,⁸ was prohibited.

For other instances, see Banerjee's "Law of Marriage," 2nd ed., pp. 52, 54; Bhattacharya's "Hindu Law," 2nd ed., pp. 85, 86.

Custom. Marriages between members of different castes may be recognized by local custom.¹

Exogamy. 2. A member of one of the twice-born classes cannot marry the daughter of an agnate, i.e. of a person belonging to the same gotra,² or primitive stock, as himself.³

This will prevent a marriage between persons who are connected with a common ancestor entirely through males.

In this connection the expression gotra "means a family descended from one of the several patriarchs, who are, according to some, twenty-four, and according to others, forty-two in number."

There seems to be no certainty as to what are the gotras at the present day. Apparently there are eight primitive gotras descended from the seven Rishis, Viswamitra, Jamadagni, Bharadwaja, Gotama, Attri, Vasistha, Kasyapa, together with Agastya. The remaining gotras are possibly subdivisions of these eight, but are not all identifiable with them.⁴

"The theory of the gotra, as latterly described by Brahmanic writers, denies that either a Kshatriya, or a Vaisya, or a Sudra has a right to say that he belongs to a special gotra in the proper sense of the term."⁵ Kshatriyas and Vaisyas have adopted the gotras of the spiritual guides or family priests of their remote progenitors.⁶ It is also said that a man is prohibited from marrying a girl belonging to a gotra having the same pravaras or principal sages as his own."⁷

Sastri G. C. Sircar, in his "Law of Adoption,"² says, "In fact the prohibited degrees for marriage are considered by the Sanskrit writers to constitute sapindas for the purpose of marriage, and they are different according to different sages. For instance, Vasishtha declares that a man may marry a girl who is fifth and seventh on the mother's and father's sides respectively, whilst Paithinasi says that a damsel may be espoused who is beyond the third on the mother's and fifth on the father's side.³ But seven degrees on both sides appears to be prohibited by Manu, for he declares that a man must not marry a girl who is sapinda to his mother,⁴ and lays down generally in another place that sapinda relationship ceases with the seventh ancestor."⁵

Exceptions.

In spite of the above rules, a man may marry a girl who is removed by three *gotras*⁷ from him, although she be related within the above degrees.⁸

"The three gotras in the case of the descendants of a bandhu are always to be counted from his (the bandhu's) own gotra. So also in the case of the descendants of the ancestors of a bandhu, who is the father's or the mother's maternal uncle's son, they are to be counted from the bandhu's own gotra. But in the case of the descendants of the ancestors of each of the other bandhu's, the gotras are to be counted from his (the bandhu's) maternal grandfather's gotra."⁹

In practice these rules are, apparently, among all classes, not taken to exclude a sapinda girl beyond the fifth degree on the father's side, and the third degree on the mother's side,¹⁰ but in strictness this relaxation of the rule is said to be limited to the Kshatriyas in all the forms of marriage, and to the other classes only in the Asura,¹ or other inferior forms of marriage.²

The above rules are enunciated by Sir G. D. Banerjee in his "Law of Origin of Marriage and Stridhan." They are based upon the interpretation put by Raghunandana upon the text of Manu. As so interpreted, the text prohibits a man from marrying a girl who is a *sapinda*³ of his father or of his maternal grandfather.⁴ This sapinda relationship ceases after the fifth or seventh degree from the mother and father respectively.⁵ Yajnavalkya⁶ also requires that a man should not marry his sapinda. This rule is common to all schools, but there is a diversity between the view entertained by the Mitakshara school⁷ and that entertained by the Bengal school⁸ as to the meaning of sapinda relationship.

Difference between schools.

According to the Mitakshara⁹ school a man cannot marry a girl if, their common ancestor being traced through his or her father, such common ancestor is not beyond the seventh¹⁰ in the line of ascent from him or her, or, their common ancestor being traced through their mothers, such common ancestor is not beyond the fifth in the line of ascent from him or her.

Mitakshara school.

Dr. J. N. Bhattacharya says,¹¹ "I must note also the fact that those who are governed by the Mitakshara school practically exclude, for purposes of marriage, only the four lines¹² that are considered ineligible by the Bengal school."

⁸ According to the Bengal school the expression means connected by the offering of the funeral cake, but "For purposes relating to marriage, Raghu-nandana," who is the chief authority in that school on the subject of marriage, "has not given any importance to the definition of the term 'Sapinda.' He has relied upon express texts to exclude girls within the seventh degree on the father's side, and the fifth degree on that of the mother. There are, however, passages in the 'Udvahatattwa,' in which the term 'Sapinda' is taken to include in its denotation all agnates and cognates within the aforesaid limits." Stepmother's relations.

A man cannot marry his stepmother's brother's daughter, or daughter's daughter.¹

The prohibition is based on a text of Sumantu,² which specifies these persons. According to a reading of the text, the Western schools exclude also the stepmother's sisters and their daughters, and some persons hold that sapinda relationship in the case of the stepmother is the same as in the case of the natural mother up to the fifth degree.³

Sastri G. C. Sircar treats this rule of exclusion of certain of the stepmother's relations as being one of merely moral obligation, and as having no legal force.⁴

Other rules of restriction.

There are other rules of restriction on intermarriage, which are now considered to be of mere moral obligation, and which are not universally observed.

The paternal uncle's wife's sister, and her daughter, and the wife's sister's daughter were excluded.⁵ In all of these cases the marriage is valid in law.⁶

In former times a man could not marry the daughter of his spiritual guide or pupil,⁷ or a girl bearing his mother's name,⁸ or a girl older than him in age.⁹

The latter view has been accepted by Nanda Pandita in the "Dattaka Mimansa,"⁷ and it is therefore to be supposed that it would be acceptable to the Benares and Mithila schools.⁸

his adoptive father, who has not joined² in the adoption, seems unsettled.¹

widows.

As the Hindu law does not recognize the remarriage of widows, there are necessarily no rules providing for the case.

It would seem that a widow cannot marry a person whose relationship to her is such that she could not have married him if she had never been married. It is said² that in order to ascertain what relatives of her first husband are forbidden to her in marriage reference should be made to the rules as to penance and appointment (niyoga), and to some special texts which pronounce certain relations as equal to mothers.

The rules in "Manu" as to penance would exclude a man from marrying the widow of his father,³ of his son,⁴ and of his guru.⁵

The application of the ancient rules of niyoga would apparently prevent a man from marrying the widow of his paternal or maternal grandfather, his father's widow, his father's or mother's sister, the widow of his paternal or maternal uncle, his father-in-law's widow, his sister or his daughter, his son's widow or daughter, or the widow of his guru.⁶

Vrihaspati⁷ pronounces as equal to mothers, the mother's sister, the paternal and maternal uncle's wife, the father's sister, the mother-in-law and the wife of an elder brother.

Jats.

Among the Jats of the North-West Province, marriage between a widow and her husband's brother is allowed.⁸

Void marriage. A marriage made within the prohibited degrees is void.⁹

The woman is entitled to receive maintenance from the man.¹⁰

The Hindu law did not permit a woman whose marriage was void on account of identity of gotra, or as being within the prohibited degrees, to marry again, even if the marriage was not consummated.¹¹

Where the marriage was void on account of difference of caste, the Hindu law, according to some authorities, allowed the woman to remarry if the error was discovered before the ceremony of garbhadana,¹ but not otherwise.² The case is unlikely to occur, but if it did, the Courts might decline to consider that a void marriage is any impediment to a subsequent marriage.³

WHO MAY GIVE IN MARRIAGE.

The gift of a female minor in marriage must be by or with the consent of her father or other guardian in marriage. The consent of the guardian is also necessary in the case of the marriage of a male minor.⁴

Where there is a gift by or with the consent of a legal guardian, and the marriage rite is duly solemnized, and where the marriage of a male minor takes place with the consent of such guardian, the marriage is irrevocable.⁵

For the purposes of marriage the age of majority, according to the Bengal school, is the end of the fifteenth year,⁶ and according to the schools of law based on the Mitakshara, the end of the sixteenth year.⁷ The age of majority for the purpose of marriage is not affected by the Indian Majority Act.⁸

marriage contemplates a gift of the girl by her father or other guardian rather than a contract between the parties to the marriage, a bridegroom cannot be forced upon an unwilling bride.¹ The gift is made merely in discharge of the duty of the guardian, and not in exercise of any right of property in the girl.²

A father can,³ expressly or by implication,⁴ delegate his authority to another person. Delegation of right.

It is submitted that no other guardian can delegate his right, except, perhaps, to a person on whom the right might eventually devolve, as in the case of Ram Bunsee Koonwaree (Maharanee) v. Soobh Koonwaree (Maharanee),⁵ where the nearest male kinsman assented to the paternal grandmother giving the girl in marriage.

A father or other guardian loses his right to give in marriage when he has neglected to exercise the right for a long time, or has in other ways waived the right.⁶ Loss of right.

The conviction of the father for theft does not necessarily destroy his right to give his daughter in marriage.⁷

A father or other guardian in marriage can enforce his right by suing for an injunction to prevent the marriage of his ward to a person of whom he does not approve,⁸ and the Court will in a suitable case grant an injunction pendente lite to restrain such marriage.⁹ Remedy of guardian.

The order of the Court may be subject to restrictions upon the exercise of the rights of the guardian.¹

Court.

The Court will restrain a guardian from an improper exercise of his authority; but the Court will not, except in a case of gross misconduct, interfere with the exercise of the discretion by a father.²

Guardian
appointed by Court.

Where a guardian of the person or property of a minor has been appointed by a High Court, or by a Civil Court acting under the powers contained in Act VIII. of 1890, the rights of the guardian in marriage are subject to the control of the Court appointing a guardian,³ and such Court can, it is submitted, give all necessary directions with regard to the marriage of the ward.⁴

Bengal Court
of Wards.

Where a minor is a ward of the Bengal Court of Wards, the leave of such Court must be obtained before the marriage.⁵

Madras Court
of Wards.

Whoever without the previous consent of the Court of Wards abets the marriage of a minor ward of the Madras Court of Wards is liable on conviction before a Court of Session to a fine not exceeding Rs. 2000, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or to both.⁶

When minor
herself.

The Hindu law permits a girl to choose a husband for herself, if there be no available relation having a right to give her in marriage,⁷ or if her guardian in marriage has neglected to provide a husband for her for, at any rate, three years after she has attained a marriageable age.⁸

In the former case the Hindu law required the girl to obtain permission from the King before selecting a husband for herself.⁹ Although the Law Courts now exercise the functions relating to minors, which were formerly exercised by the Sovereign in person, no such application to the Court seems to be contemplated by modern practice.

The case would not be likely to occur, but effect would apparently be given to a marriage entered into by a girl who has no relations entitled to give her in marriage, provided the marriage be in other respects unexceptionable.

In the case of the guardian neglecting to give the girl in marriage, the right of the guardian next in order would apparently accrue,¹ rather than that the girl should be able to select a husband for herself.²

It is said that, if a girl chooses a husband for herself, she cannot take with her any ornaments which have been given to her by her father, mother, or brothers.³

A marriage, otherwise legally contracted, and performed with the necessary ceremonies, is not rendered invalid by the mere absence of the consent of the guardian in marriage,⁴ or by the circumstance that it was contracted in disobedience of an order of a Civil Court.⁵

The Courts have power to declare that a marriage, which has been entered into without the consent of the guardian, is on that account invalid, and would probably do so, at any rate if the marriage has not been consummated, in a case where the interests of the child had been disregarded, and where a person having no pretence of authority had disposed of the child in marriage.⁶

Where the marriage has been induced by force or fraud,⁷

it would on that account be declared to be invalid, apart from any question as to the want of consent "by the guardian."¹

There would be great difficulties in setting aside a marriage which had been consummated, and in any case it would be difficult to obtain a bridegroom for a Hindu girl who had already gone through the form of marriage with another person.

Consent to re-marriage of minor widow.

A minor² widow whose marriage has not been consummated cannot remarry without the consent of her father, or, if she has no father, of her paternal grandfather; or if she has no such grandfather, of her mother; or, failing all these, of her elder brother; or failing also brother, of her next male relative. Marriages made without such consent may be declared void by a Court of Law, but the consent is to be presumed until the contrary is proved, and no such marriage can be declared void after it has been consummated.³

In the case of a widow who is of full age, or whose marriage has been consummated, her own consent is sufficient consent to constitute her marriage valid.⁴

Agreement to pay money to guardian.

It is unsettled whether a father or other guardian can enforce an agreement to recompense him in consideration of the marriage of his child or ward.

The Bombay High Court has refused⁵ to enforce such a claim on the ground that it is opposed to public policy, but the Madras High Court has in the case of a marriage in the asura form taken a different view.⁶

In a Bengal case¹ the judges of the High Court expressed differing views, but the question did not directly arise in that case.

It is submitted that where the marriage is between Brahmins or Kshatriyas such agreement is void.² In other cases, such agreement might, it is submitted, be enforced, if it be fair and reasonable, and the marriage be contracted in the interests of the child. The *asura*³ form of marriage itself contemplates a payment to the guardian.

There is no objection to a payment of money by the guardian of a girl to the proposed bridegroom in consideration of the marriage.⁴ Payment to bridegroom.

The father, or other guardian, can recover money which he has paid as the consideration for a marriage which has not taken place.⁵

the marriages of the daughters of male members of such family,¹ including the daughters of those who are excluded from inheritance.

The expenses of the marriage of a male member of a family will not justify a sale of property,² although they would be properly payable out of income.

In the case of a joint family governed by the Bengal school of law the marriage expenses of, at any rate, the daughters of the co-sharers, and of persons who are excluded from inheritance,³ and possibly also those of other unmarried female members of the family, such as daughters of adult sons of co-sharers, would apparently be payable out of the family property.⁴

father.

A father is not, in the absence of a contract, under a legal liability to pay the marriage expenses of any of his children,⁵ but after his death the reasonable expenses of the marriages of his daughters are payable out of his estate.⁶

Such expenses create a charge upon the property to the same extent as rights of maintenance create a charge,⁷ and to such extent only.

FORMS OF MARRIAGE.

The only forms of marriage now recognized by the general Hindu law are the Brahma form and the Asura form. Both forms are now applicable to all classes. Forms of marriage now recognized.

The ancient Hindu law allowed the following eight different forms of marriage.¹ The first four of these were considered approved forms. Ancient forms of marriage.

1. The Brahma.²

This form of marriage originally contemplated the gift of the girl by Brahma, her father to a man learned in the Vedas,³ and was, therefore, peculiar to Brahmins.

It is the only one now left of the four approved forms of marriage, and is now suitable for all classes.⁴

2. The Daiva.⁵

In this form, which was peculiar to Brahmins, the maiden was given Daiva, in marriage to the officiating priest.⁶

3. The Arsha.⁷

In this form the father gave his daughter in consideration of one or Arsha, two pair of oxen.⁸ It was peculiar to Brahmins.

4. The Prajapatya or Kaya.⁹

In this form the bridegroom was an applicant for the bride. It was Prajapatya, peculiar to Brahmins.¹⁰

¹ See "Manu," chap. iii. paras. 31-41. "Yajnavalkya," i. 58-61. "Narada," chap. xii. paras. 39-54. Colebrooke's "Digest," vol. iii. 604. "The different forms of marriage recognized by the Hindu law are probably to be traced historically to the customs of different tribes which afterwards coalesced to form a single community," per West, J., in Vijayarangam v. Lakshuman (1871), 8 Bom. H. C. O. C. 244, at p. 254.

In this form the bridegroom purchased the bride from her father.² The only difference between this form and the Arsha form is that in this form property other than cattle is taken by the father of the bride.³ The mere giving of a present to the bride does not render the marriage an Asura marriage.⁴

This form of marriage was permissible to Vaisyas and Sudras, but not to the two highest classes.⁵ It is now applicable to all classes,⁶ and seems to be commonly practised throughout India. It is said to be, in fact, the most common form of marriage,⁷ at any rate among Sudras in Southern India,⁸ and members of the Bhandari and other inferior castes in Western India.⁹

6. The Gandharba.¹⁰*Gandharba.*

Allowed by custom.

This form depended solely upon the mutual consent of the parties marrying. It was confined to the Kshatriyas or military class,¹¹ and seems to have been effected by mere consummation.¹² Although this form of marriage is not recognized by the general Hindu law, a form of that name is permitted in some cases by family usage. In a case decided by the Bengal Sudder Court in 1817, a marriage by a member of the military class in this form was recognized,¹³ and the same Court, in 1853,¹⁴ upheld a similar marriage by a Rajah of Julpigoree, who belonged to an aboriginal tribe, which had to some extent adopted Hindu customs.¹

This form of marriage is said to still exist in the family of the Tipperah Rajahs,² and it was recently asserted to have taken place in a family in Ganjam.³ A religious ceremony is now as necessary in a marriage in this form as when the marriage takes place in the ordinary forms.⁴ The Gandharba form of marriage as now celebrated, and the ancient form seem, therefore, to resemble one another in name only.

7. The Rakshasa.⁵

This was a marriage by capture,⁶ and would in the present day be Rakshasa, dealt with by the criminal law.⁷ It was peculiar to the Kshatriyas, or warrior class.⁸

8. The Paisacha.⁹

In this form the Hindu law for the sake of the woman and her Paisacha, offspring treated as a marriage a seduction by fraud.

particular class of persons or family, a marriage in such form is valid.

In the case of a family or race which is not Hindu by origin, but which has gradually, or otherwise, more or less adopted Hindu customs or Hindu law, a custom at variance with Hindu law would be upheld,¹ provided that it were not repugnant to general ideas of morality.

Forms of marriage according to family usages.

The following forms of marriage peculiar to individual families have (amongst others) been recognized by the Courts :—

In the Raj family of Hill Tipperah, marriage takes place in the *Gandharba*² or *Santigrikita*³ form, but the wife married in that form seems to be inferior to a wife married in accordance with the ordinary form.⁴

A Rajah of Orissa can marry a girl of a different caste in what is called the phulbiha form, which consists in putting a garland round the neck of the woman, or in an exchange of garlands.⁵

The Sagai form,⁶ by which widows of the Nomosudra caste,⁷ and of the Koiries and other low castes in Behar,⁸ and of the Hulwae caste,⁹ remarry.

The Kurao Dhureecha, or the marriage of a widow with her deceased husband's brother, is common among Jats¹⁰ and the Lodh caste¹¹ in the North-West.

Where "a new Hindu sect comes into existence, and, New sect. from religious scruples, adopts a form of marriage somewhat different to the ordinary form, it would be going too far to hold that these marriages are void, and thus to bastardize a whole community, simply because the sect and its practices are of recent origin."³

MARRIAGE CEREMONIES.

It is usual, but not necessary, that marriage should be Betrothal. preceded by a betrothal, or formal promise by the father, or other guardian,⁴ to give the girl in marriage.⁵ Such betrothal is revocable,⁶ and is not, in law, any obstacle to a marriage with another man.⁷

A promise of marriage cannot be enforced by a suit for specific Effect of performance,⁸ but a refusal to complete a betrothal, or a promise of breach of promise.

marriage, by an actual marriage would give to the injured party a right to recover from the person making the promise compensation for the loss, if any, sustained by the breach of promise.¹ In case of such breach, a father, or guardian, would be entitled to recover money properly expended in contemplation of such marriage.² Such suits cannot be brought in a Provincial Small Cause Court.³

Death of bride. Should the betrothed damsel die before the marriage, the bridegroom is entitled to recover back the presents given by him to her, subject to paying such expenses as have been incurred.⁴

Necessity for ceremonies. There can be no valid marriage in any form without a substantial performance of the requisite religious ceremonies.⁵

Even when the gandharba form of marriage⁶ is permissible by custom the Courts will not recognize it unless religious rites have been performed, although the gift of the bride is in a marriage in that form unnecessary.⁷

Hindu law does not recognize a marriage contracted by a Hindu, otherwise than with Hindu ceremonies, as, for instance, while he is a convert to another religion.⁸

Nature of ceremonies. The ceremonies vary according to local or family usage. The ceremonies which are usually performed⁹ are described in detail by H. T. Colebrooke,¹ and in lesser detail in Banerjee's "Law of Marriage"² and in Bhattacharya's "Hindu Law."³ See also Risley's "Tribes and Castes of Bengal," vol. i. pp. 148-152.

The ceremonies usually commence with the performance of the Usual ceremonies. nandimukh, or vridi shradda, by the bride's father in honour of his ancestors,⁴ and the ceremonious bathing of the bride. On the bridegroom coming to the house he is ceremoniously received, and certain ceremonies, the most important of which is the gift of the bride to the bridegroom,⁵ are observed. On the night of that day, or on the day following, the operative marriage ceremonies are performed by the bridegroom and bride. This is called panigrahana, or the acceptance of the bride's hand by the bridegroom. The sacred fire is kindled and oblations are made. The bridegroom takes the bride's hand, she steps on a stone. The bridegroom recites a fixed text. A hymn is chanted. The bride and bridegroom walk round the fire, and then comes the most material of the marriage rites. The bride is conducted by the bridegroom, and directed by him to step successively into seven circles, a text being recited at each step. This is called Saptapadi. On the taking of the seventh step, and not until then, the marriage is complete and irrevocable.⁶ The bride thenceforth becomes a member of her husband's family.⁷

Other ceremonies which are not essential to the validity of the marriage are subsequently performed.⁸

Sata (exchange) marriage, which, according to the custom of the Kudwa Kunbi caste, is conditional upon the bridegroom's father providing a girl to be married to the son of the bride's father, does not take effect until the condition has been performed, although the marriage ceremonies have been completed.⁹ Conditional marriage.

engagements made on the marriage of a Hindu female who has not been previously married, are sufficient to constitute a valid marriage, have the same effect, if spoken, performed, or made on the marriage of a Hindu widow; and no marriage can be declared invalid on the ground that such words, ceremonies, or engagements are inapplicable to the case of a widow.¹

tion.

Although certain ceremonies are usual when the wife attains puberty, consummation is not necessary to the validity of a Hindu marriage.²

There may be a custom by which a ceremony is necessary on the wife obtaining puberty.³

Force or fraud.

Whatever ceremonies had been performed, force or fraud practised upon one of the parties to induce a marriage would justify a Court, at the instance of the aggrieved party, in declaring the marriage to be void.⁴

DISPUTES AS TO MARRIAGE.

Jurisdiction to

The Courts have power to determine the validity of a marriage either in a suit properly constituted for that purpose, or in a suit or proceeding in which the question incidentally arises.⁵

For instance, the question may arise in a suit for the possession of property, or for the restitution of conjugal rights, or in a proceeding relating to the guardianship of a minor, or as to the right to letters of administration, or in a criminal prosecution for bigamy, or adultery, or for enticing away a married woman.

she alleged himself or herself to be, the husband, or wife of the plaintiff.¹

A decision as to the fact or validity of a marriage can only bind the parties to the litigation,² and then only if the case complies with the conditions prescribed by s. 11 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908.³

Where it has been proved that marriage has been celebrated there is a presumption that it is valid in law,⁴ and that all the necessary ceremonies were performed.⁵

It has been held by a Bench of the Bengal High Court⁶ that this presumption, although it applies to questions of inheritance, does not apply to a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, and that in such a suit the performance of the ceremonies must be strictly proved, but in an earlier case another Bench of the same Court⁷ applied the presumption to a similar suit. It is submitted that there is no valid reason for making this distinction. Evidence of treatment is sufficient to prove a marriage, even in a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, where the parties are not subject to the Indian Divorce Act,⁸ which, of course, Hindus are not, so, a fortiori, evidence of the marriage having been celebrated would, it is submitted, be sufficient.

This presumption applies also in the case of the remarriage of a widow.⁹

It has no application when a former valid subsisting marriage has been proved.¹⁰

Presumption
marriage.

There is also a presumption that the marriage was according to one of the approved forms.¹ As the Brahma form is the only one remaining of such forms,² it follows that there is a presumption that the marriage was in accordance with the Brahma form.

Offences re-

In prosecutions under ss. 494, 495, 497, and 498 of the Indian Penal Code³ the fact⁴ and validity⁵ of the marriage must be strictly proved.⁶

DIVORCE.

Divorce.

Divorce is unknown to the general Hindu law.⁷

Divorce is allowed by custom in certain localities and among certain low castes.⁸

As to the castes and localities in which such custom exists, see Steele's "Law and Custom of Hindu Castes," pp. 168, 169, Risley's "Tribes and Castes of Bengal." Crooke's "Tribes and Castes of the North-Western Provinces and Oudh." Banerjee's "Law of Marriage," 2nd ed., pp. 337-399. Mayne's "Hindu Law," 7th ed., pp. 114-116.

Where it is allowed by custom, a divorce by mutual agreement is recognized by law.⁹

Although matters of divorce are frequently adjudicated upon by a panchayat, or assembly of a caste, such panchayat has no power to declare a marriage void or to give permission to a woman to remarry.¹ In such castes a divorce is generally not effectual, except with the authority of the panchayet.²

It is incompetent to Hindus at the time of their marriage to arrange that the marriage be void in certain events,³ whether divorce be or be not permissible in the particular caste.

Except under the circumstances provided for in Act XXI. of 1866, the Courts have no power to decree a divorce.⁴

A dissolution of marriage is not effected by the adultery⁵ of the husband or wife. Adultery.

The only remedy which a blameless wife has against an offending husband is to obtain a decree for her separate maintenance,⁶ such decree being practically equivalent to a decree for judicial separation.⁷ Remedy of wife.

It is unsettled whether the Indian Divorce Act⁸ has any application to a Hindu marriage contracted before the conversion of the parties to Christianity. The High Court of Bengal has held that it applies,⁹ but the High Courts of Madras¹⁰ and the North-West Provinces¹¹ have taken a different view. It is submitted that the latter view is correct. Divorce at
Christianity.

Where a Hindu husband or wife is deserted or repudiated on the ground of his or her conversion to Christianity, a decree for divorce can, under the provisions of Act XXI. of 1866,¹ be made in favour of the person so deserted or repudiated, and the parties can marry again as if the prior marriage had been dissolved by death.²

RECIPROCAL RIGHTS AND DUTIES.

THE parties to a marriage cannot by arrangement or otherwise¹ vary the rights, duties, and other incidents which the law attaches to the state of marriage. An anti-nuptial agreement, by which the husband agreed never to remove his wife from the parental abode, has been held not to be binding on him.² Similarly, no effect can be given to an agreement which provides that, on the husband taking another wife, the first marriage should be void.

RIGHTS TO SOCIETY AND GUARDIANSHIP.

A husband is entitled to the society of his wife.³ He can require her to live with him wherever he may choose to reside,⁴ and to submit herself obediently to his authority.⁵

for separation.

Effect cannot be given to an arrangement between a husband and wife that they should separate, and that neither of them shall sue for restitution of conjugal rights, unless the agreement indicates a state of circumstances which would be an answer to a suit for restitution of conjugal rights.¹ An arrangement for a separation to commence at a future date would be contrary to public policy.²

of minor wife.

A husband, even if he has not attained the age of majority,³ is the lawful guardian of the person of his minor⁴ wife,⁵ in preference to her parents or other relations, unless, according to the custom of the caste or community to which he belongs, he be precluded from such custody until the wife be fit for marital intercourse.⁶

It is the practice among the Hindu community in the Madras Presidency for a wife to be left with her parents until she attains puberty. The husband is only entitled to the custody of her person when such custody is necessary in her interests.⁷

of minor widow.

After the husband's death the guardianship of his minor widow, and the management of her property, devolve upon the husband's heirs generally, or upon those who are entitled to inherit his estate after her death,⁸ in preference even to her own father.¹ On failure of her husband's heirs the widow's paternal relations are her guardians, and failing them, her maternal kindred.²

Having regard to the custom of the country that women, Restraint of wife. at any rate in the higher positions of life, are secluded in the zenana, a Hindu husband would apparently be entitled to exercise, within reasonable limits, a certain amount of restraint upon his wife, even if she be an adult, so as to keep her at home.³

"The Hindu law, while it enjoins upon the wife the duty of attendance on, obedience to, and veneration for, the husband, inculcates that the husband must honour the wife and treat her with affection and courtesy."⁴ Duty of husband to wife.

In spite of early texts, which give a husband power to correct his wife,⁵ it is clear that he is no way justified in chastising or assaulting her. The Indian Penal Code⁶ does not exempt a husband from liability for an offence committed against his wife's person, except that it provides⁷ that sexual intercourse by a man with his own wife, the wife not being under twelve years of age, is not rape. enforced against the other party to the marriage¹ by a suit for restitution of conjugal rights.²

Suit for possession of person of wife.

A suit for the purpose of obtaining possession of the person of a wife will not lie against the wife;³ but such suit might be treated as in substance one for restitution of conjugal rights.⁴

Grounds for refusing decree.

The circumstances which justify desertion are an answer to a suit for the restitution of conjugal rights.⁵

Defence to suit for restitution.

In *Dadaji Bhikaji v. Rukmabai*⁶ the Court said, "It may be advisable that the law should adopt stringent measures to compel the performance of conjugal duties; but, as long as the law remains as it is, Civil Courts, in our opinion, cannot, with due regard to consistency and uniformity of practice (except, perhaps, under the most special circumstances), recognize any plea of justification other than a marital offence by the complaining party, as was held to be the only grounds upon which the Divorce Courts in England would refuse relief in Scott v. Scott."⁷

The circumstances which justify desertion are—

It is submitted that this application of a principle of English law leads to difficulties, as a suit for judicial separation is inapplicable to Hindus. The matter must be dealt with by Hindu law (ante, pp. 2-4). See Buzloor Ruheem (Moonshee) v. Shumsoonissa Begum (1867), 11 M. I. A. 551, at p. 614; 8 W. R. P. C. 3, at p. 15.

1. Cruelty, whether physical or moral, in a degree rendering it unsafe for the wife to return to the power of her husband.¹ Cruelty.

Cruelty to a less degree,² as, for instance, an unfounded imputation upon the wife's chastity,³ or taking her jewels from her,⁴ or mere unkindness or neglect⁵ short of cruelty, would not seem to be an answer to a suit for restitution. In a case where a husband, a Brahmin, having expelled his wife, was living in his house with a low caste prostitute, he was refused restitution.⁶

There seem to be no reported decisions in India on the subject, and it is unlikely that any cases would occur, but there seems to be no reason why cruelty by the wife should not be an answer to a suit by her for restitution of conjugal rights. Cruelty of wife.

2. The fact that the person suing for restitution of conjugal rights is suffering from a loathsome disease.⁷ Loathsome disease.

Thus a decree was refused to a husband suffering from leprosy and syphilis.⁸ It would follow that the communication of a noxious disease would justify a wife in declining to consort with her husband.⁹ Communication of disease.

If the principle laid down in *Dadaji Bhikaji v. Rukmabai*¹⁰ be correct, diseases, which are not the result of marital offences, would be excluded from consideration.

wife.

3. Adultery by the wife¹ in a suit by the wife.²

As to adultery by a husband, see post, p. 68.

Loss of caste.

It is unsettled whether mere loss of caste is an answer to a suit for restitution of conjugal rights.

Under the ancient law a wife could not be compelled to live with an outcast husband.³ The High Courts at Agra⁴ and Allahabad⁵ have declined to accept loss of caste as an excuse for refusal to cohabit, but in another Allahabad case⁶ the High Court made return to caste a condition precedent to a decree. The right to the society of the wife would, it is submitted, be a right within the meaning of Act XXI. of 1850,⁷ but the Court would, it is also submitted, have to inquire into the reasons for the degradation, in order to satisfy itself that a decree would not inflict unnecessary hardship upon the wife. Where the loss of caste is capable of expiation the course adopted in the above case was, it is submitted, correct.⁸ Where the loss be such as to involve no moral turpitude, the Court would not treat it as an excuse for desertion.

It is not easy to say, in the present state of Hindu society, what offences justify a degradation from caste.⁹

It is also unsettled whether the adoption of another religion by the person seeking restitution is an answer to the suit. It would apparently be an answer in most cases.¹⁰

The matter stands to some extent on the same footing as the case of degradation from caste. It would undoubtedly have been under the ancient law a ground for desertion. In the case of a conversion to

C. 13, where the Court ordered the wife of a converted Brahmin to be restored to him on a writ of habeas corpus. If the rule adopted in Dadaji Bhikaji v. Ruknubai (ante, p. 64) be correct, change of religion would be no answer.

Christianity the procedure provided by Act XXI. of 1866¹ would by implication prevent a Court from forcing cohabitation upon a party refusing it on the ground of the conversion of the person seeking it to Christianity. In the case of a conversion to Mahomedanism it would be impossible to enforce cohabitation. The mere abandonment of Hinduism without any formal exclusion from caste would scarcely be an answer. A return to Hinduism after performance of the prescribed expiation would dispose of an objection to cohabitation on the ground of conversion.

As to the effect of a change of religion upon the marriage tie, see ante, p. 59.

Conduct which has been condoned is no answer to a Condonation. suit for restitution, unless it has been revived by subsequent misconduct.²

A decree for restitution of conjugal rights cannot be refused on any of the following grounds:—

1. The fact that the marriage has not been consum- Non-consum-

2. Minority.

Minority.

The minority of the husband can be no answer to a suit by him, as he is ordinarily entitled to be the guardian of his wife's person,⁴ and it can scarcely be an answer to a suit against him. The minority of the wife would be no answer to a suit by the husband, except under circumstances which would disentitle him to act as guardian of her person,⁵ but it might in some cases be proper to put him upon terms: for instance, that she should be placed by him in charge of, a female member of his family.⁶ The minority of the wife could be no answer to a suit by her.

Sir William Macnaghten¹ considered that the insanity of the husband justified his wife in deserting him. He relies on a text of Manu,² which has been otherwise interpreted.³ There is a text to the effect that the insanity of the wife is a ground for excluding her from the husband's bed, and from pilgrimage, but from nothing else.⁴

weakness.

Mental infirmity short of insanity can clearly be no answer to a suit for restitution.⁵

Second
marriage.

4. A second marriage by the husband.⁶

Adultery.

5. Adultery by the husband.⁷

Where the husband is actually living in adultery,⁸ or his conduct has been such as to prevent his wife from returning to him without loss of caste (see ante, p. 66) or injury to her self-respect and religious feeling,⁹ the Court might refuse a decree.¹⁰

Impotence.

It is submitted that the impotence of the plaintiff¹¹ originating after marriage is no answer to a suit for restitution.

Whether it is an answer when it was existing at the time of the marriage would, it is submitted, depend upon whether the Court would set aside the marriage on that account.¹² *Manu*¹³ makes no distinction between impotence arising after and impotence arising before marriage,

but the text by which he is said to permit a wife to abandon an impotent husband has been differently interpreted.¹

Where it would be manifestly unjust to order restitution of conjugal rights, the Court can refuse to make such order. Where order would be unjust.

For instance, in Moola v. Nundy,² where, in consequence of the misconduct of the husband, a panchayet had adjudged a separation, and the parties had lived apart for thirteen years, the Court declined to make an order.

A right of suit for restitution of conjugal rights arises on a refusal, express or implied, to return to cohabitation. When right of suit arises.

A formal demand, and refusal, to return to cohabitation is not a condition precedent to such suit,³ but there must be a willingness on the part of the plaintiff to resume cohabitation.

In England a rule of Court⁴ prevents a suit being brought for restitution of conjugal rights without a demand before suit to return to cohabitation. There is no such rule in India, although the Limitation Act⁵ has assumed that such demand is necessary.

A second suit for restitution based upon the continued disobedience to the decree in the first suit would apparently be barred by the law of res judicata,⁶ but a second withdrawal from cohabitation would give a fresh cause of action.⁷ Repetition of refusal.

The Limitation Act provides that a suit for the restitution of conjugal rights must be brought within two years from the time when restitution is demanded, and is refused by the husband or wife, being of full age and sound mind.⁸ Limitation.

It has been held by the Allahabad High Court¹ that "in cases where the personal law of the parties does not require antecedent demand, nor deprives minors and persons of unsound mind of the conjugal right of cohabitation, No. 35 of the Limitation Act has no application, nor sec. 34, but that the suit would fall under the general provisions of No. 120 of the Limitation Act." The practical effect of this decision would be to exclude Hindus from the operation of this article. It is submitted that, where there has been a demand and refusal, the article applies. Where there has been no demand or refusal it may be that we have to look elsewhere for a period of limitation, and that there is "a continuing wrong" within the meaning of sec. 23 of the Act.²

Where the wife is a minor, or insane, there seems to be no limitation to a suit by the husband for restitution of conjugal rights,³ although there is such limitation where the suit is brought against another person for recovery to the wife.

Form of decree. The decree should declare that the plaintiff is entitled to the restitution of conjugal rights, and that the defendant (if the wife) be directed to go to her husband's house.⁴ If the defendant be the husband the decree should direct him to restore such rights to his wife.

Conditional decree. The Court may make a decree for restitution of conjugal rights upon conditions to be fulfilled by the plaintiff. In one case⁵ the decree was made subject to the husband being restored to caste. In another case⁶ the Court required "that the house which the husband provides shall be in every respect fit for the reception of a virtuous and respectable wife." The Court might also require proper security to be taken for the protection of the wife.¹

When the party, against whom a decree for restitution of conjugal rights has been made, has had an opportunity of obeying it, and has wilfully failed to obey it, the decree may be enforced by his or her imprisonment,² or by the attachment of his or her property, or by both.

Execution of decree.

When the attachment has remained in force for one year, if the decree has not been obeyed, and the decree-holder has applied to have the attached property sold, the property may be sold, and out of the proceeds the Court may award to the decree-holder such compensation as it thinks fit, and may pay the balance (if any) to the judgment debtor on his or her application. If the judgment debtor has obeyed the decree, and paid all costs of executing the same, which he or she is bound to pay, or if, at the end of one year from the date of the attachment, no application to have the property sold has been made or granted, the attachment should cease to exist.³ The Court can refuse execution, and may order periodical payments to the wife.

A husband who seeks to recover his wife from a person harbouring or detaining her, may sue such person to recover his wife,⁴ and may also sue for damages on account of her detention.

Remedies against third person.

A suit for the recovery of a wife must be brought within two years from the time when possession is demanded and refused.⁵

The decree can be enforced by imprisonment and attachment.⁶ It cannot be enforced by physically placing the wife in the possession of her husband.⁷

Where the wife is confined under such circumstances that the confinement amounts to an offence, there is also, throughout India, a summary remedy by a magistrate's order.²

Guardians and Wards Act.

Where the husband has already had the custody of his minor wife, and she has left, or is removed from, his custody, there is also a remedy under sec. 25 of the Guardians and Wards Act.³

Damages.

The husband is also entitled to recover damages from the person harbouring his wife or enticing her away,⁴ whether or not for improper purposes, and to obtain an injunction against such person from interfering with his wife rejoining him.

"Every person who receives a married woman into his house, and suffers her to continue there after he has received notice from the husband not to harbour her, is liable to an action for damages, unless the husband has, by his cruelty or misconduct, forfeited his marital rights, or has turned his wife out of doors, or has, by some insult or ill-treatment, compelled her to leave him."⁵

A suit for damages against a person committing adultery with a wife would also apparently lie.⁶

It is not possible to lay down any exact rule as to the measure of damages in these cases. The principles adopted in English cases might, to some extent, be applied. On the one hand, the Court should consider the loss of the wife's society, affection, services and assistance in domestic affairs, and the social injury (if any) which the husband is likely to suffer from the act complained of. On the other hand, the behaviour of the husband towards his wife may be taken into account.

The capacity of the defendant to pay damages is not generally (if ever) a circumstance for consideration.¹

RIGHTS OVER PROPERTY.

Except that in times of pressing need he may use his wife's separate property,² and that he has in certain cases a right of inheritance, a husband does not by marriage acquire any beneficial interest in his wife's property.³ A wife is able to deal with what is called her stridhan property,⁴ whether acquired before, at, or after marriage, in the same way as if she had never been married.⁵

A Hindu wife is competent to contract,⁶ but unless she be an agent, either express or implied, of her husband, she does not thereby bind him or his property. She only renders liable the property over which she has a disposing power.⁷

There are cases to the effect that a wife's liability is limited to the extent of her stridhan,⁸ whether she contracts separately or jointly with her husband,⁹ but there seems to be no reason why she should not be as fully liable as a male contractor.¹⁰ This question is not, however, now of much importance, as a woman is exempt from imprisonment in execution of a money decree.¹

Necessaries.

Where the wife is living with her husband, or is living apart from him under such circumstances² as would justify an order for separate maintenance, the Court would presume an authority to bind the husband for necessaries,³ but such presumption can be rebutted by evidence that the authority has been revoked.

Suit by or against married women.

A Hindu married woman can sue or be sued in her own name.⁴

There is no presumption of law that transactions which stand in the name of the wife are the husband's transactions,⁵ although it may frequently happen that a husband buys property in his wife's name.

Power of husband over his property.

Except so far as she may be entitled to maintenance thereout,⁶ to a share on partition,⁷ and to rights of inheritance, a wife does not by marriage acquire any interest in her husband's property or any voice in its management.⁸

Debts of re-married widow.

A person who marries a Hindu widow is not, merely by reason of such marriage, liable for any of the debts of a prior deceased husband of such widow.⁹

Suits between husband and wife.

A husband may sue his wife, and a wife may sue her husband, in respect of any cause of action in the same way as if they were independent of one another.¹⁰

There is nothing in the law to prevent a Hindu husband or wife Theft. from being convicted of theft of the property of the other, but having regard to the authority which, when husband and wife are living together, would necessarily arise from the married state, it would generally be difficult to prove a dishonest intention. Where the wife is acting in concert with her paramour the intention would be more obvious, as she would not in that case be likely to suppose that she had authority from her husband.¹

MAINTENANCE.

A wife is entitled to receive from her husband² food, Maintenance of wife. raiment, lodging, and provision for religious or other duties incident to the status in life which she occupies.³

As to maintenance out of property belonging to a joint family of which her husband is a member, see post, pp. 242, 272; and as to her right to a share on partition in lieu of maintenance, see post, pp. 329-334. She has no right to be maintained by her own or by her husband's relations,⁴ unless they have property belonging to her husband in their hands.⁵

Except where she has been guilty of infidelity,⁶ a husband may be required to maintain his wife, even though she cannot compel him to restore her to other conjugal rights.⁷

Although under the Hindu law the right of a wife to be maintained by her husband does not depend upon the possession of any property by him,⁸ a wife would gain nothing by a suit against a penniless husband, and could only force him to maintain her by the fruits of his labour by a proceeding under the Criminal Procedure Code.⁹

In a case where the wife has left her husband, and is Right to pledge husband's credit.

Abandonment of Hinduism.

Although the husband may abandon Hinduism, he cannot thereby destroy his wife's right of maintenance.²

The Court can award maintenance to a wife whose marriage has been dissolved under the provisions of the Native Converts Marriage Dissolution Act, 1866.³

inheritance.

Where the husband is excluded from inheritance on the ground of some disqualification,⁴ his wife is, if chaste, entitled to maintenance out of the property to which he would have succeeded if he had not been so disqualified.⁵ If her sons succeed to the inheritance she has the right of a mother.⁶

maintenance.

A wife would ordinarily be entitled to maintenance in her husband's house,⁷ but when he, without excuse,⁸ refuses to allow her to reside with him,⁹ or when she is justified in residing apart from him,¹⁰ she is entitled to separate maintenance.¹¹

Except where there is such refusal or justification, a wife cannot enforce an arrangement for separate maintenance.¹²

This applies also to impartible property.²

A widow is not entitled to maintenance out of property belonging to her husband which had become forfeited to Government on his conviction for rebellion,³ but her right would be unaffected by a confiscation on account of the rebellion of her sons, or other heirs of her husband.⁴

which belonged to her husband, or in which he was a coparcener.¹

In other words, when the husband or his branch is separated from the other members of a family governed by the Mitakshara school of law, or where the husband was governed by the Bengal school of law, the right of the widow to maintenance out of property belonging exclusively to relations of her husband would be confined to the property of her husband's male ascendants in the male line, and of her own male descendants in the male line.

The sale of ancestral property which would have bound her husband if alive, does not give a right against a father-in-law or other coparcener for maintenance.²

in the house in which her husband required her to be maintained, or if she from just cause abstained from residing in that house.

Where the family property is so small that the family cannot bear the strain of supporting the widow in a separate lodging, though it might be able to provide her with food in the family house, a Court might well in the exercise of its discretion refuse separate maintenance,¹ or, at any rate, in fixing the maintenance might decline to allow any amount on account of the expenses of a residence.²

A widow by unchastity forfeits her right of maintenance,³ Loss of right. even if such maintenance has been secured by agreement⁴ or decree.⁵

Where the agreement for maintenance is made by way of compromise of a claim for something more than maintenance, unchastity would not, in the absence of express provision, destroy the right to maintenance.⁶

It is unsettled whether an unchaste wife or widow, on returning to a moral life, is entitled to what is called "starving maintenance," that is to say, just sufficient food to keep her alive. It is submitted that she is so entitled. In *Honamma v. Timannabhat*⁷ the Bombay High Court allowed the right, but it was disallowed by the same Court in Valu v. Ganga.⁸ In *Nagamma v. held that there was no such right. In an earlier case¹ the same Court considered the question unsettled. In *Romanath v. Rajonimoni Dasi*² the Bengal High Court was inclined to allow the right. Earlier authority is in favour of the right.³

It is clear that she is not entitled even to "starving maintenance," so long as she persists in a vicious life,⁴ but it has been held that where "starving maintenance" has been allotted to her by decree, subsequent unchastity does not destroy the right.⁵

Mere loss of caste does not involve a loss of a right of maintenance.⁶

proof.

Where there is property liable for the maintenance of a widow, it lies upon the parties resisting the claim to separate maintenance to show that the circumstances are such as to disentitle the widow thereto.⁷

For example, they may show that she resides separately from her husband's family for immoral purposes,⁸ or that the family property is so small as not reasonably to admit of an allotment to her of a separate maintenance, or that she has other means of maintenance.⁹

right.

A wife or widow cannot transfer her rights to maintenance.¹⁰

Attachment.

A right to future maintenance or an interest in the income of immovable property assigned by way of maintenance¹¹ cannot be attached in execution of a decree,¹² but there is nothing to prevent the attachment of arrears of maintenance.¹³

Unless their rights are secured by an arrangement or by decree,¹ it is submitted that a Hindu can by a transfer for consideration dispose of his property so as to deprive his wife or such other person whom he is legally bound to maintain² of any right of maintenance against the property so disposed of,³ except where such transfer is made with the intention of defeating the right, and the transferee has notice of such intention.⁴

Loss of maintenance by transfer of property.

As to an alienation pending suit, see post, p. 92.

Provided he leaves sufficient property for the maintenance of his widow and those whom by law he is legally bound to support, a Hindu can dispose of his property by gift or will, so as to free it from claims to maintenance.⁵

Gift or will.

A Hindu cannot by disposing of the whole of his property by will deprive his widow of her right to be maintained out of such property.⁶

The right to maintenance cannot be enforced where the wife, or widow, or other person claiming it⁶ has full independent means of support.⁷ Where there is independent means of support, it must always be taken into account in fixing the amount of maintenance.⁸

Jewels and other property which are unproductive of income need not be taken into account.⁹

property in which her husband was a coparcener, if the husband's separate property be sufficient for her maintenance.¹ No reasons were given for this proposition.

The amount which a wife is entitled to receive for her maintenance would ordinarily depend upon the position in life of the husband, the extent of his property, and the claims upon him being taken into consideration. Amount of maintenance, wife.

Yajnavalkya² fixed one-third of the husband's property as the proper amount, and this view has been acted upon in Bombay,³ but the Courts will not now consider themselves bound by any such fixed rule.⁴

The conduct of the claimant to maintenance,⁵ and, it is said,⁶ the Conduct. conduct of the husband, may be taken into consideration.

In fixing the amount of maintenance for a widow, provision must be made for her reasonable wants, namely, for the performance of charities and the discharge of religious obligations, in addition to reasonable provision for her food, raiment, and lodging, having regard to the amount of the estate which is liable for her maintenance, her position in life, and the circumstances of the family.⁷ Amount of maintenance, widow.

ceremonies as by custom it be proper for her to perform,¹ should be provided for.

Principle of allotment of maintenance.

The following has been held² to be the principle upon which maintenance is to be allotted to a widow :—

“Where a widow has asked for separate maintenance, you look first at the mode of life of the family during her husband's lifetime and you try to find out what amount will be sufficient to allow the widow to live as far as may be consistently with the position of a widow in something like the same degree of comfort and with the same reasonable luxury of life as she had in her husband's lifetime. Then you see what the husband's estate is, and you also see how far that estate is sufficient to supply her with maintenance on this scale, without doing injustice to the other members of the family who also have their rights as heirs, or their rights to maintenance out of the estate.”

There is no general rule as to the amount of maintenance to be allotted to the person entitled thereto. The amount of the property available, the claims of the different persons entitled to maintenance thereout, and the reasonable wants of the claimant for the support of himself and his family in accordance with the position of the family must all be taken into consideration.³

“The amount of the property . . . is an element in determining the sufficiency of a maintenance, but it cannot be regarded as the criterion. Other circumstances, and even the position and conduct of the claimant . . . may reduce the maintenance.”⁴

The necessities of the claimant are also not the sole criterion.⁵

The life of austerity in which, according to the Shasters, a Hindu widow is required to live, is not to be taken into consideration;⁶ but, on the other hand, a widow is not necessarily entitled to be maintained in such a way that she can live in the same style as she lived in when her husband was alive.⁷

Any saving that she may make by living with her own family is not to be taken into account.⁸

A widow is not entitled to maintenance in excess of the annual proceeds of the share to which her husband would have been entitled on partition if he were living.¹ Limited to husband's share.

If the produce of such share be insufficient for her support, it might be necessary to sell the share, and support her out of the proceeds.

Her funeral expenses² are also payable out of the estate chargeable with her maintenance. Funeral expenses.

The maintenance of a wife or widow is postponed to the payment of the debts of the husband, or of the family, as the case may be. Debts have priority.

The right to maintenance does not operate on property which has been sold to pay the debts of the husband or of the family, even if the purchaser had notice of the claim of the widow.³

It is not settled whatever debts take precedence of maintenance which is charged upon property by a decree or agreement. In two Allahabad cases,⁴ in which the question did not arise, the Court held that debts had such precedence. It is submitted that maintenance charged by a decree is on the same footing as a mortgage, and takes precedence of subsequent charges, and of all simple contract debts⁵ created by or entered into by the person against whom the decree is made, or his representatives. Maintenance charged by an agreement Maintenance charged on property.

would also, it is submitted, when there is no fraud upon creditors, take precedence of the debts of the person entering into the agreement, or his representative, when the agreement complies with the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act.¹ Maintenance charged by a will would not take precedence of the debts of the testator.

Maintenance
not a charge.

The maintenance of a wife or widow is in one sense a charge upon the property of the husband, whether ancestral or self-acquired,² but it is not a charge in the fullest sense of the term, because it does not necessarily bind any part of the property in the hands of a purchaser.³ It becomes a complete charge if it be fixed and charged upon such property, or a portion thereof, by a decree or by agreement,⁴ or by a will.⁵ cannot dispute the decree.¹ It is otherwise in the case of a decree against the father,² or other member of the family personally. A mere personal decree for maintenance does not create a charge.³

By virtue of her right to maintenance a widow is entitled to contest the factum of her husband's will,⁴ or to dispute a contention that property passed by it, but she does not thereby acquire a right to dispute the will of her son.⁵

dispute will.

The question as to whether a bonâ fide purchaser for valuable consideration is bound by a right of maintenance out of the property purchased by him has been the subject of considerable discussion in the Courts.

Transfer of property when claim to maintenance

The 39th section of the Transfer of Property Act⁶ is as follows:—

“Where a third person has a right to receive maintenance, or a provision for advancement or marriage, from the profits of immovable property,⁷ and such property is transferred with the intention of defeating such right, the right may be enforced against the transferee, if he has notice of such intention or if the transfer is gratuitous; but not against a transferee for consideration and without notice of the right, nor against such property in his hands.”

Illustration.

A, a Hindu, transfers Sultānpur to his sister-in-law B, in lieu of her claim against him for maintenance in virtue of his having become entitled to her deceased husband's property, and agrees with her that, if she is dispossessed of Sultānpur, A will transfer to her an equal area out of such of several other specified villages in his possession as she may elect. A sells the specified villages to C, who buys in good faith, without notice of the agreement. B is dispossessed of Sultánpur. She has no claim on the villages transferred to C.

The first portion of this section refers only to transfers made with the intention of defeating the right, but the latter portion, taken with the illustration, shows that it extends to other cases.

The following propositions seem to arise from the Act, and from the decisions:—

1. A purchaser would be bound by a decree charging the property with the maintenance,¹ except where the purchase had been made in execution of a decree, which bound the widow, or which enforced a claim, which under the Hindu law takes precedence of a claim to maintenance.²

“When the maintenance has been expressly charged on the purchased property, it will be liable, although it be shown that there is property in the hands of the heirs sufficient to meet the claim.”³

2. A purchaser would be bound by an agreement for maintenance which satisfies the conditions required for a mortgage under the Transfer of Property Act,⁴ or which had been followed by possession.

He would also, it is submitted, be bound by an agreement, which did not satisfy such conditions, but which was enforceable against the transferee, if he had notice of such agreement.⁵

3. When the maintenance is not charged on the property by a decree, or by an agreement equivalent to a mortgage, the purchaser is bound by the right to maintenance if the transfer be made with the intention of defeating the right, and he has notice of such intention.⁶

4. When the maintenance is not so charged, and there is no such intention, or if there be such intention, the purchaser has no notice thereof, a *bonâ fide*¹ purchaser is not affected by the claim, whether he has notice thereof or not.²

In earlier cases it was held that a bonâ fide purchaser without notice was not affected by the claim, but that a purchaser with notice of the claim³ or, at any rate, with notice of the existence of a claim likely to be unjustly impaired by the proposed transaction,⁴ or, as it has been put in another case,⁵ a notice that the right cannot be satisfied without recourse to the property purchased, was subject to it.

There is also authority that the widow must exhaust her remedies against the heir, or, at any rate, prove that there is no property of the deceased in the hands of the heir before recovering against the purchaser.⁶ The inconvenience of this doctrine has been pointed out by the Bombay High Court.⁷

The Hindu law places on the same footing all the so-called charges on the inheritance,¹ as debts,² expenses of initiation of sons,³ and marriage of daughters.⁴ It could scarcely be that a bonâ fide purchaser, even with notice of the existence of a claim in respect of any one of these so-called charges, should bear the burden of their payment.⁵ In a case where the money had been raised by purchase for the purpose of paying any of these charges it would follow that the purchaser would be under no liability.⁶ Would it be reasonable in any case, except where the transaction was intended to the knowledge of the purchaser to be a fraud upon the charge, to require a purchaser from an absolute owner to inquire as to the purposes for which the money was being raised? Moreover, the texts give a charge on the inheritance to wives as to widows, but a wife cannot enforce her maintenance against a purchaser from her husband.⁷

"If there is an ample estate out of which to provide for the widow, so that she may get her claim fixed and secured, or if, knowing of the proposed sale, she does not take any step to secure her own interest, no imputation of bad faith, or of abetting it, can be made against the purchaser of a portion of the joint property. If the widow, on the other hand, is not accepting support from the coparcener in satisfaction of her claim; if she lives apart, and the estate is small and insufficient, it is the vendee's duty before purchasing to inquire into the reason for the sale, and not by a clandestine transaction to prevent the widow from asserting her right against the intending vendor."⁸

Transfer

A right of maintenance is not affected by a transfer made during the pendency of a suit for maintenance,⁹

¹ Strange's "Hindu Law," vol. i. chap. viii. In Bhartpur State v. Gopal Dei (1901), 24 All. 160, at p. 163, the Court said, "In fact, a widow's right to receive maintenance is one of an indefinite character, which, unless made a charge when the property, by agreement or by decree of the Court, is only enforceable like any other liability in respect of which no charge exists."

unless such transfer be effected for the purpose of paying off a debt, which has priority over the claim for maintenance.¹ Where the suit for maintenance does not seek to charge specific property, the doctrine of lis pendens does not apply.²

An heir or coparcener,³ or devisee,⁴ or a purchaser with notice of her claim and possession,⁵ cannot oust a widow from property which is liable for her maintenance, without securing her maintenance.

Possession of property by widow.

The possession would, it is submitted, be in this case evidence of an arrangement charging the property.⁶

A widow may enforce her right of maintenance against the proceeds of the property in the hands of the heir.⁷

A widow may, for the purpose of securing her maintenance, sue to compel the persons in possession of the estate, out of which the maintenance is payable, to give security for the due payment of her maintenance, or to have it made a charge upon the estate, and may, in a proper case, obtain an injunction to restrain them from wasting or alienating the estate.¹⁰ If she does not wish for such charge, she may sue for maintenance already due,¹ or for a declaration that it is payable, or she may combine a claim for arrears with a prayer for a charge or for security.

A decree for arrears is not of right, but is in the discretion of the Court.² Where the person claiming maintenance has been supported, without having incurred any expense or liability, the Court might well exercise its discretion by refusing to grant arrears.

Small Cause Court.

A suit relating to maintenance cannot be brought in a Provincial Small Cause Court.³ A suit for maintenance payable out of immovable property cannot be brought in a Presidency Small Cause Court,⁴ but a suit on a bond or other personal contract for maintenance can be brought in such court.⁵

Future maintenance.

The Court should discourage a multiplicity of suits for the maintenance of one person, and should, if possible, where necessary, make a decree for future maintenance.⁶

The widow is not entitled to sue for possession of the property.⁷

A wife, who is entitled to separate maintenance, has apparently similar remedies.

Enforcement of agreement.

When maintenance is fixed by an agreement, which is equivalent to a mortgage, it may be enforced by a suit under the Transfer of Property Act.⁸

Parties to suit.

The widow is entitled to sue all or any of the heirs in possession of property subject to her maintenance.⁹

or decree the claimant may recover the amount from any person holding any portion of the property liable.¹ The person paying it would have a right of contribution against other persons liable therefore.²

The right to sue for maintenance commences when there has been a wrongful withholding of payment of the proper amount. When right to sue commences.

This withholding may be proved otherwise than by a claim and refusal.³ Part non-payment is prima facie evidence of such withholding.⁴

amount.

Where the parties do not agree, it is for the Court to fix the rate of maintenance payable in future,² and it may, by its decree, award arrears of maintenance.³

As to the principles upon which maintenance should be fixed, see ante, p. 86.

The Judicial Committee will not interfere with the exercise of the discretion by the Courts in India in fixing maintenance, except where strong grounds exist.⁴

Duty of Court. The proper course for a Court in ordering maintenance is to make it a charge upon specific property,⁵ or to set apart a sum of money sufficient to yield the required allowance, and, if necessary, sell a part of the estate for that purpose.⁶ In some cases the Court might be satisfied with security given by the reversioners.

The allowance fixed by the Court for maintenance should cover all necessary expenses for maintenance and house rent.⁷

It is better to fix an annual sum, and not a share of the income of the estate.⁸

It has also been held that "in decrees where maintenance is awarded,

Such modification cannot be made in a proceeding in execution of a decree, unless the terms of the decree are such as to permit of such modification.²

Maintenance may be cancelled if the wife or widow has become unchaste,³ or where, in the case of a wife, the circumstances have so changed that she should be called upon to return to her husband's house. The rate of maintenance may be diminished when there has been such a change in the circumstances of the wife or widow, or of the husband, or person liable for the maintenance,⁴ such change not arising from any fault of his own.⁵ Except where provision is made in the decree for that purpose, an order for maintenance cannot be cancelled or diminished in proceedings in execution.⁶

The rate may be increased if the cost of food has become greater or the profits of the estate of the husband have materially increased.⁷

decree.

Where a decree directs the payment of future maintenance from time to time, it can be enforced by execution,² and for the purposes of limitation the decree is as to each year's annuity to be regarded as speaking on the day upon which from that year it became operative.³

A decree which merely declares a right of maintenance is not capable of execution.⁴

RELATIONSHIP OF PARENT AND CHILD, AND ADOPTION.

THE only children now recognized by the general Hindu law as legitimate, are those who are born during the existence of a lawful marriage between their parents,¹ and also sons who have been adopted according to the dattaka form.²

"The legal presumption in favour of a child born in his father's house of a mother lodged and apparently treated as a wife, treated as a legitimate child by his father, and whose legitimacy is disputed after the father's death, is one safe and proper to be made, and the opposing case should be put to strict proof."³

Children born out of wedlock, although illegitimate, have rights of maintenance,⁴ and, if they are not members of one of the three regenerate classes, then the illegitimate sons possess rights of inheritance.

In the country subject to the Mithila school of law, a son may be adopted according to the Kritima form.⁵

son, or even a daughter, in the sense that a son can be adopted by an Englishman, i.e. by treating him as a son, and giving or devising property to him, but in that case no rights of inheritance, or of performing religious ceremonies are created by the so-called adoption. The relationship is purely contractual, and is determinable at the option of either of the contracting parties. A son so taken is called a palaka putra.¹

Sons recognized in ancient times.

In ancient times the Hindu law recognized the following descriptions of sons² as legitimate sons, viz. :—

1. Aurasa, or legitimate son by a wife.

2. Kshetraj, or son born of a wife duly appointed to raise issue for a husband on failure of any begotten by him.³ This was the son begotten under the practice of niyoga,⁴ by which a relative was appointed to raise up issue by the wife of a childless husband, or one deceased without leaving children.⁵

3. Putrika putra, or son of appointed daughter.⁶ In ancient times a man could appoint his daughter to raise up issue to him.

4. Kanina, or son of an unmarried woman.

5. Gudhaja, or secretly born son of an adulterous wife.

6. Paunarbhava, or son of a twice married woman. This included not only the son of a woman who had gone through the ceremony of marriage, but also the son of a woman who had connection with a man.

7. Sahodha, or son of a pregnant bride.

8. Nishada,⁷ or son of a member of one of the regenerate castes by a Sudra woman.⁸

¹ See Nilmadhob Doss v. Bishumber Doss (1869), 13 M. I. A. 85; 3 B. L. R. P. C. 27; 12 W. R. P. C. 29; Kalce Chunder Chowdhry v. Shreeb Chunder (1865), 2 W. R. C. R. 281; *Bhinana Gudu v. C. 393, or abyyamana putrum (son of affection).

² The order in which the several kinds of sons are placed by various authors varies, but necessarily all concur in giving preference to the aurasa son.

9. Dattaka, or son given in adoption.

10. Kritima, or son made, i.e. where a man without parents accepts a proposal that he should be taken in adoption.

11. Kritaka, or son bought.¹

12. Apaviddha, or son forsaken by his parents, and taken in adoption.

13. Svayandattaka, or son self-given. The only difference between this son and the Kritima son seems to be that in the former case the offer comes from the adoptee, and in the latter case it comes from the adopter.

Of these the only sons that are now recognized by Hindu law are the Aurasa son, and the Dattaka son. According to the Mithila school a Kritima son can be taken in adoption.² Adoption in this form is based upon recent works,³ and is not referable to the ancient practice of taking Kritima sons.

ADOPTION ACCORDING TO THE DATTA KA FORM.

An adopted son is a person capable of being adopted,⁴ who is given by a person competent to give,⁵ to a person competent to receive in adoption,⁶ and who has been so given and received in the way prescribed by Hindu law.⁷

The adoption of a son is a matter of religious obligation to a childless Hindu, who has no prospect of procreating male issue,⁸ although it may generally happen that adoptions originate "in the ordinary human desire for perpetuation of family properties and names."⁹ It is said that originally the motives for adoption were secular, and that subsequently religious and secular motives were mixed.¹⁰

Jains.

Jains are governed in matters of adoption by the ordinary rules of Hindu law.¹ The Dattaka son is the only adopted son recognized by them,² but as they do not accept the Hindu doctrine as to the spiritual efficacy of sons, they are influenced only by secular considerations in adopting.³

Motive for adoption.

The motive for the adoption does not affect its validity.⁴

The fact that an adoption is made for the purpose of defeating an alienation will not affect its validity.⁵

As to the motives of a widow for an adoption, see post, p. 119.

Custom prohibiting adoption.

A family,⁶ or caste,⁷ custom prohibiting adoption is valid.

The burden of proving such custom lies on the person alleging its existence.⁸

Agreement not to adopt.

An agreement not to adopt would not apparently invalidate an adoption made in breach of it, but so far as property the subject of such agreement is concerned, it might bind the parties to it. It would not, under any circumstances, bind any one except the actual parties to it.⁹

Although this case was governed by the Mitakshara law, and under that law the son of one of the parties had acquired a right to the property by birth, the reason given for the decision that the effect of the terms of the arrangement would be to alter the law of descent would apply equally to a case governed by the Bengal school. See also Rajender Dutt v. Sham Chund Mitter (1880), 6 Calc. 106.

So far as self-acquired property is concerned, or in cases to which the Bengal school of law is applicable, a father might by a valid gift over, in case of a contemplated adoption by his son, put pressure upon such son to prevent or control his adopting, but the adoption would not be invalidated thereby.¹

The fact that an adoption was made in breach of an agreement to adopt another boy, which was not carried out, does not render the adoption invalid.²

A girl cannot be given or taken in adoption.³

Adoption of girl.

Among the Nambudri Brahmins on the west coast of India, there is in force a practice of giving a daughter in what is called sarvasvadhanam marriage, in order that the son born of her should be affiliated as the son of the father giving her.⁴ He does not inherit in the family of his father so long as other sons exist.⁵

and capable of inheriting, may take a son in adoption, unless he be mentally incapable of understanding the nature of the act.¹

The existence of any other descendant is not a bar to an adoption.²

wife.

It is immaterial whether the adoptive father be hopeless of issue or not. The pregnancy of his wife does not, whether he be, or be not, ignorant of it, prevent a Hindu from adopting,³ and the adoption is not invalidated by the child of which the wife of the adopter is pregnant at the time of the adoption turning out to be a male.⁴

son.

If the son be permanently incapable of performing religious rites by reason of congenital blindness, deafness, dumbness, impotency, lameness, virulent leprosy, insanity, idiocy, or from any other reason, which involves an incapacity to inherit,⁵ he may be treated for this purpose as non-existent.⁶

Where son has
worldly affairs,

There is authority that when a son absolutely renounces the world and all property, and enters a religious order, as by becoming a sannyasi, ascetic, or fakir, his existence is not an impediment to an adoption by his father.⁷

It has been suggested⁸ that this question may be affected by Act XXI. of 1860, but it is submitted that there is not in this case a question of a "forfeiture of rights or property," or impairing or affecting any right of inheritance "by reason of his renouncing, or having been excluded from the communion of any religion, or being deprived of caste."

Where a son, natural or adopted, became an outcast, ^{Loss of caste, etc.} or renounces the Hindu religion, the Hindu law¹ permitted an adoption, but the effect of Act XXI. of 1850 is to prevent the natural or previously adopted son from being ousted from any of his legal rights.²

When the question as to the validity of such an adoption shall arise, it may be that "the Courts would refuse to recognize an adoption which could confer no civil rights."³ Except in the case of an after-born son, to which different considerations apply, the co-existence of a natural son possessing civil rights as such, and an adopted son, does not seem to be in accordance with Hindu law as laid down by the Courts. The difficulty in adjusting the respective rights would lead to great inconvenience, but, on the other hand, it seems hard upon a father that he should be unable to regain the religious benefits, which are lost to him by the conversion, or degradation of his son.

Mr. Mayne⁴ says "that the question might become of importance on the death of the natural son without issue," but the subsequent death of the son would not render the adoption valid.⁵

It is submitted that where a son has disappeared, and ^{Missing son.} has not been heard of for many years, an adoption, if made, is not valid unless, at the time when the adoption is in question, it be proved that such son was dead at the date of the adoption.⁶

Death of son. An adoption, which is invalid on account of there being a living son, is not rendered valid by the death of that son.¹

Consent of son. It has not been decided whether the assent of a natural or adopted son to a subsequent adoption can validate an adoption during the lifetime of such son,² but it is clear that it would not do so unless such assent be completely free, and has been given with a full knowledge of the circumstances.³

It is submitted that consent to the adoption would not prevent a son from disputing it,⁴ except where his conduct had amounted to an estoppel.⁵ Otherwise it would be difficult to adjust the respective rights of the legitimate and adopted son,⁶ except where an arrangement had been arrived at with regard to them. Sastri G. C. Sircar⁷ treats the judgment in *Rungama v. Atchama*⁸ as deciding that the consent of the son could render the adoption valid; but it has, it is submitted, no such effect.

Bachelor or widower. The fact that a man is a bachelor⁹ or a widower¹⁰ does not prevent him from taking a son in adoption.

Provided that he has attained the age of discretion, a minor¹ is not incapacitated, as such, from taking a son in adoption, or giving permission to adopt.² Adoption by minor.

There does not appear to be any case in the Reports, in which there has been an adoption by a Hindu, who has not attained the age of majority according to Hindu law.

The cases on the subject deal with the capacity to give permission to adopt, but the reasons given in those cases would apply as much to the capacity to receive in adoption, as to the capacity to give permission to adopt. These cases refer to the "age of discretion," which apparently means the age at which a Hindu is competent to perform religious ceremonies,³ but that age does not appear to be fixed.

Of the cases which are cited as authorities for the above proposition, in Jumona Dassya Chowdhrani v. Bamasoonderai Dassya Chowdhrani,⁴ the person giving the power had attained the age of majority according to the law to which he was subject⁵; in Patel Vandravan Jekisan v. Patel Manilal Chunilal,⁶ it was held that permission could be given by a person who was within two months of arriving at the age of majority; and in Rajendro Narain Lahoree v. Saroda Soonduree Debia,⁷ the report does not specify the age, but the boy had apparently not completed his fifteenth year, as he was described as a minor.

In considering this question it may be remembered that a minor governed by the Mitakshara school would by adoption be acting to his temporal disadvantage, as he would thereby introduce a new coparcener into the family.⁸

It may be that the age depends upon individual capacity, but such a conclusion would, if possible, be avoided, as it would make the title of the adopted son depend upon an uncertain foundation.

Sastri G. C. Sircar argues that an adoption by a minor is inconsistent with Hindu ideas.⁹ He points out that no case of adoption by a minor has as yet arisen.¹⁰ It is very unlikely that the question as to an adoption by a minor would arise. His capacity to give a power of adoption may stand on a different footing, as such power would be for his spiritual benefit, and may become necessary when he is on his deathbed.

In a case governed by the Maharashtra school there seems no reason why the authority of the husband should not be implied, whatever was his age at the time of his death,¹ and in a case governed by the Dravida school the authority of the sapindas to authorize an adoption would not apparently be affected by the age of the husband at the time of his death.

Hindu Wills Act.

The Hindu Wills Act² provides rules for the execution of wills to which the Act is applicable, and in such cases prevents a minor from disposing of his property by will,³ but as section 3 of the Act declares that nothing therein contained shall affect any law of adoption, the question as to the capacity of a minor to give authority to adopt is apparently untouched by that Act.⁴

Non-testamentary permission.

It seems now to be impossible for a minor to execute a valid non-testamentary document conferring an authority to adopt, as a registering officer is required to refuse to register a document executed by a person who appears to him to be a minor.⁵ The Legislature has not provided for the case of a verbal permission given by a minor.

Sastri G. C. Sircar⁴ says that Colebrooke's English translation of a passage⁵ in the "Mitakshara" is the only authority for denying to persons excluded from inheritance the right to adopt, and he gives a translation which has not such effect. The "Dattaka Chandrika" recognizes the right,⁶ and the same view was taken by Sutherland.⁷

degradation.

Change of religion, or degradation from caste, does not interfere with the capacity to take in adoption.⁸

Where a man has not only renounced Hinduism, but has also adopted another system of religion with a personal law attached to it, such as Mohammedanism, he would lose a right which is alien to the system adopted by him.⁹

bodily state.

In the case of members of the twice-born classes, a person suffering from virulent leprosy, and possibly one suffering from any other incurable disease,¹⁰ would apparently be incompetent to take in adoption,¹¹ at any rate until he had performed expiation according to the Shastras.¹² In less serious cases of leprosy, it seems clear that there is no objection to adoption, at any rate after expiation.¹ In the case of Sudras, leprosy can be no disqualification for taking in adoption.²

Their lordships in that case were dealing with an appointment by a mohunt of a chela to succeed him, and not with an adoption in the ordinary sense. In all the Courts it seems to have been assumed that incurable leprosy would prevent such appointment.

In the case of Sudras, as no religious ceremonies are necessary,³ an adoption by a person who is in a state of ceremonial impurity from the death or birth of a relation is not on that account invalid.⁴

It is not settled whether among the twice-born classes a person can adopt when he is in a state of impurity arising from the death or birth of a relation,⁵ and has not performed the necessary expiation.

This question is not one of great importance, as a person in a state of impurity would be unlikely himself to perform ceremonies which would be of no religious efficacy. He is apparently competent to perform such ceremonies vicariously,⁶ and if they are performed the Court will uphold the adoption.⁷ There seems no doubt that ceremonial impurity can be removed by expiation. The Courts would probably be disinclined to give effect to a disability which can be cured by expiation.⁸

In *Lakshmi Bai v. Ramchandra*⁹ it was said, "There is thus admittedly no authoritative Smriti text on the point, and whatever the efficacy of ceremonial strictness may be, the Courts which administer the law in British India must be guided by what is the received practice and custom of the country or the class to which the parties belong."

The fact that the adoptive father is ceremonially impure does not prevent his receiving in adoption, and he can postpone the religious ceremonies until the pollution has been removed.¹⁰ ascetic.

It has been held that a professed ascetic cannot take in adoption.¹

Although the Hindu codes did not contemplate an adoption by a person, who had renounced the world for the sake of religion, there seems now, having regard to the provisions of Act XXI. of 1850, nothing to prevent a person from emancipating himself from a religious order and taking a son in adoption.²

unnecessary.

A husband does not require the assent of his wife to his taking a son in adoption. He may adopt in spite of her express dissent.³ A wife may, however, join in an adoption by her husband.

There is said to be a practice in Bengal by which a man adopts a son in conjunction with more than one wife.⁴ There seems to be no legal objection to this practice, but a question may arise as to whether the son inherits to the relations of the wives concurring in the adoption.⁵

woman.

A woman cannot take a child to herself in adoption.⁶

If she goes through the form of doing so, the boy acquires no rights thereby, either in her property or in that of her husband.

A woman can, if she is governed by the Mithila school of law, take to herself a son according to the Kritima form of adoption.⁷

PERMISSION TO WIFE OR WIDOW TO ADOPT.

A Hindu, who is capable of taking a son in adoption, can give to his wife power to adopt a son, or sons in ² In Mhalsabai v. Vithoba Khandappa Gulve (1862), 7 Bom. H. C. App. xxvi., it was held that there is nothing in the Hindu law books to show that a Vaisya who has undergone the ceremony of Vibhut Vidā (a ceremony indicating renunciation of worldly affairs, analogous to "retirement to a forest," in ancient law, Sircar's "Law of Adoption," p. 201) is incapable of adopting a son.

Best, J., expressed the opinion that a Jain widow who succeeded absolutely to her husband's property, could adopt a son to herself, but such expression of opinion was unnecessary for the decision of the case. succession,¹ to him, to be exercised either during his lifetime,² or (except he be governed by the Mithila school of law³) after his death.⁴

"A man cannot delegate to others, to be exercised after his death, any greater power than he himself possessed in his lifetime."⁵

The existence of a son, grandson, or great-grandson, who is not permanently incapacitated from performing religious rites,⁶ does not of itself invalidate a power, but it prevents the exercise of the power, which remains in suspense.⁷ In the event of the son, grandson, or great-grandson dying unmarried, or leaving no son or widow behind him, the power, if it be still in existence,⁸ can be exercised.⁹

As to the case where the son, grandson, or great-grandson has renounced worldly affairs, see ante, p. 104.

It is said that when a person is by reason of impurity arising from his bodily state, such as from virulent leprosy, disqualified from adopting,¹⁰ he can nevertheless give to his widow a permission to adopt.¹¹

Under no circumstances can a son be adopted by any one except the man to whom he is adopted, or his widow.¹²

A power of adoption may be revoked, either expressly Revocation of power. or by implication.

An example of a revocation by implication would be where, after giving the power, the man himself took a son in adoption.¹

The mere birth of a son would not necessarily imply a revocation, but it might, taken with other circumstances, have such effect.²

Where the power is contained in a will, to which the Hindu Wills Act³ applies, it cannot "be revoked otherwise than by another will or codicil, or by some writing declaring an intention to revoke the same and executed in the manner in which an unprivileged will is required to be executed,⁴ or by the burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying the same by the testator, or by some person in his presence and by his direction, with the intention of revoking the same."⁵ Hindu Wills Act.

Where the authority contemplates simultaneous adoption by the several widows,² or that there should be two adopted sons living at the same time, the power is incapable of being exercised at all.

Permission absolute, contingent, conditional, or restricted.

The permission may be absolute, or its exercise may be contingent upon certain events,³ or may be subject to lawful conditions, or may be subject to restrictions as to the boy to be adopted, or otherwise.

Contingent on consent of others.

The exercise of the power may be contingent upon the consent of persons named by the husband,⁴ and if such consent cannot be obtained the authority cannot be exercised.⁵

A direction to a wife "to adopt a son with the good advice and opinion of the manager," does not make the adoption contingent on the consent of the manager.⁶

Implied condition expressed.

In some cases the contingency which is expressed is one that is implied by the law, as, for instance, a man gives to his wife a power to adopt in case his son dies under age and unmarried.⁷

There is authority that where the power of adoption requires as a condition of its being exercised that particular arrangements should be made with regard to the property, as, for instance, that particular property should be devoted to a charity, effect must be given to such condition.¹

The failure of a disposition as to property in a will does not necessarily affect a power of adoption.²

Where the contingency, upon the happening of which the power is to be exercised, does not occur, the power cannot be exercised.

For instance, A, leaving his wife pregnant, makes a will giving her authority to adopt "in case the son to be born shall die." The widow is delivered of a daughter. The power cannot be exercised.³

Where the exercise of the power is contingent upon circumstances, which involve an invalid adoption, or is contingent upon illegal, or immoral, or impossible conditions, the power cannot be exercised.

In a case where the power was only to be exercised in case of the disagreement of the wife and son, the power was held to be invalid.⁴

A permission to adopt must be strictly construed,⁵ and if the permission be acted upon it must be strictly followed.⁶

If the strict exercise of the power would involve an invalid adoption, then no effect can be given to the power, as, for example, where the donor of the power directs the simultaneous adoption of more than one child,¹ or the adoption of a boy during the lifetime of a living son.²

of boy.

Where the husband has specified the boy to be adopted, or the class out of which the child is to be adopted,³ his direction must be followed. It is not settled whether if a specified boy be unavailable, another boy can be adopted.⁴

In Bombay an authority to adopt a specified child would not, at any rate in the case of that child being unavailable, prevent an adoption of another child, unless the husband has expressly forbidden the adoption of any other child.⁵ In an old case⁶ a similar rule was applied in Madras, but in a recent case⁷ a different view was entertained. It is submitted that except in a case governed by the Maharashtra school of law, an authority to adopt a specified boy cannot be exercised with respect to any other boy. The above-named school permits an adoption by the widow without the express consent of her husband,⁸ and will not imply a prohibition to adopt a boy other than the named boy.

Should that child die, or be refused by his parents, the authority would still be held, at least, in Bombay, to warrant the adoption of another child, unless, indeed, he had said 'such a child and no other.' Where the adoption is otherwise valid, a discussion as to the motive of the widow for adopting is immaterial.¹ Motive of widow.

ADOPTION BY WIDOW.

There is a difference of opinion between the schools as to the power of a widow to adopt a son.

The difference of doctrine of the several schools of law arises from the interpretations put by the schools upon a text of Vasishta.² As to this, the Judicial Committee said, in Collector of Madura v. Moottoo Ramalinga Sathupathy,³ "All the schools accept as authoritative the text of Vasishta, which says, 'Nor let a woman give or accept a son unless with the assent of her lord.' But the Mithila school apparently takes this to mean that the assent of the husband must be given at the time of the adoption, and, therefore, that a widow cannot receive a son in adoption, according to the Dattaka form, at all. The Bengal school interprets the text as requiring an express permission given by the husband in his lifetime, but capable of taking effect after his death; whilst the Muyookhu and Koosthubha treatises which govern the Mahratta school explain the text away by saying that it applies only to an adoption made in the husband's lifetime, and is not to be taken to restrict the widow's power to do that which the general law prescribes as beneficial to her husband's soul. 'Thus, upon a careful review of all these writers, it appears that the difference relates rather to what shall be taken to constitute, in cases of necessity, evidence of authority from the husband, rather than to the authority to adopt being independent of the husband.' Origin of differences between schools.

Under the Bengal school of law a widow cannot adopt a son without the express permission of her husband.⁴ Bengal school.

Benares school. The same rule applies under the Benares school of law.¹

It applies even if the deceased husband was a member of a joint undivided family, and his rights had devolved by survivorship upon the other members of the family.²

Jains. Among the Jains, the right of a childless widow to adopt is generally co-extensive with the right which was possessed by her husband, and does not depend upon his authority, either express or implied.³

Such right, as being derogatory to the ordinary Hindu law, must be specially proved in each case. It has been affirmed in cases of members of the Saraogee, Agarwala sect from Meerut,⁴ Aligarh,⁵ and Arrah,⁶ and in a case of the Oswal sect from Moorshedabad,⁷ and also in an old case from Lower Bengal,⁸ in which it does not appear to what sect the parties belonged. In a case in Madras,⁹ it was held that the custom was not proved.

Dravida school.

According to the Dravida school, a widow can adopt, either with her husband's express permission,¹⁰ or, if there be no express or implied prohibition by him, with the assent of her husband's kindred.¹¹

"Inasmuch as the authorities in favour of the widow's power to adopt with the assent of her husband's kinsman proceed in a great measure upon the assumption that his assent to this meritorious act is to be implied whenever he has not forbidden it, so the power cannot be inferred when a prohibition by the husband either has been directly expressed by him, or can be reasonably deduced from his disposition of his property, or the existence of a direct line competent to the full performance of religious duties, or from other circumstances of his family, which afford no plea for a supersession of heirs on the ground of religious obligation to adopt a son in order to complete or fulfil defective religious rights. . . . The same reasons which justify a presumption of authority to adopt in the absence of express permission are powerful to exclude a presumptive prohibition to adopt when on a new and unforeseen occasion the religious duty arises."¹

Prohibition by husband.

Failure of disposition implying prohibition.

Power co-extensive with that of husband.

"In Madras it is established . . . that, unless there is some express prohibition by the husband, the widow's power, at least with concurrence of sapindas in cases where that is required, is co-extensive with that of the husband."²

The power to adopt with the assent of the husband's kinsmen applies to every case in which a widow might make an adoption under the express authority of her husband.³

Thus she can adopt on the death of a natural son,⁴ and she can take successive sons in adoption on the death of sons previously adopted, either with the assent of her husband⁵ or of his kinsmen.

Among the Nambudri Brahmins in Malabar in theory the widow's power is as under the Dravida school, but in its application the husband's authority is presumed, unless there is an express prohibition, at any rate when the adopting widow is the surviving member of the illam.¹

sufficient.
Joint family.

"Where the husband's family is . . . undivided, . . . the father of the husband, if alive, might, as the head of the family and the natural guardian of the widow, be competent by his sole assent to authorize an adoption by her."²

Where the father is not alive, it was said in the Ramnad case³ that "the consent of all the brothers, who in default of adoption would take the husband's share, would probably be required, since it would be unjust to allow the widow to defeat their interest by introducing a new coparcener against their will," but an adoption with the consent of the manager of the joint family, who is acting bonâ fide, would apparently be upheld.⁴

In the latter case, and also probably in the case of a consent by the father, as head of the family, such due consideration of the propriety of the adoption would be necessary,⁵ as is required in the case where the family is separate.⁶

"Even in the case of an undivided family, when a widow of a member thereof makes an adoption without the authority of her husband or the assent of her father-in-law, it cannot be taken to be the settled law that the assent of all the then surviving members of the coparcenary is absolutely necessary."⁷ The consent of kinsmen is required on account of the incapacity of women to act

rather than to procure the consent of all whose interests will be defeated by the adoption.¹

Where the joint family consists of several branches, it would seem to be sufficient to obtain the consent of the branch to which the husband belonged.²

It is clear that when the family is undivided the requisite authority cannot be sought for outside the family.³

Where the widow has taken by inheritance the separate estate of her husband, the consent of every kinsman, however remote, is not essential. The consent of the father-in-law would be sufficient.⁴ If the father-in-law be dead, "there should be such proof of assent on the part of the sapindas as should be sufficient to support the inference that the adoption was made by the widow, not from capricious or corrupt motives, or in order to defeat the interest of this or that sapinda, but upon a fair consideration, by what may be called a family council, of the expediency of substituting an heir by adoption to the deceased husband."⁵

In the latter case the consent of a majority of the sapindus was held sufficient. See Parasura Bhattar v. Rangaraja Bhattar (1880), 2 Mad. 202, at p. 206. In that case the assent of some sapindus was held sufficient on its being shown that the consent of the others was refused from interested or improper motives, or without a fair exercise of discretion. See also Venkatakrishnamma v.

A widow should give to all the sapindas concerned an opportunity to advise her with regard to making an adoption, or against adopting a particular boy.¹

The omission by the widow to ask the consent of one of two divided brothers of the deceased husband could not be justified by saying that it was known he would refuse. To consult him was essential to the widow's obtaining the mind of the kinsman on the question.²

Nature of consent.

The consent of the sapindas must be free, and given solely in the due exercise of the discretion confided to them by the law with a view to the selection of a suitable boy for adoption. Thus a consent given on an untrue representation that the widow had received the permission of her husband is of no effect.³

Gifts to procure assent.

"Though gifts to procure assent might be powerful evidence to show no adoption needed, they do not in themselves go to the root of the legality of an adoption."⁴

"There is nothing improper in a sapinda proposing to give his assent to a widow adopting his own son, if such son be the nearest sapinda, and refusing to give his assent to her adopting a stranger or more distant sapinda, if there be no reasonable objection to the adoption of his own son,"⁵ or in his stipulating that his own share should not be reduced by the adoption.⁶

When the majority of the sapindas consent, it will be presumed that their assent was given on bonâ fide grounds.⁷

If the husband was undivided in estate¹ she cannot adopt without either his express permission² or the 'consent of his coparceners.³

husband.

Where she has no express authority, the widow derives her power from authority presumed to have been given to her by her husband.⁴ Such authority is implied even when the husband was a minor at the time of his death.⁵

only son.

It has been held that the husband's authority would not be presumed in the case of the adoption of an only son, an act which, although not illegal, was considered sinful,⁶ but apparently that decision would not now be followed,⁷ and it would be held that her authority is co-extensive with that of her husband.

Undivided family.

As under the Dravida school,⁸ an assent given by her father-in-law,⁹ as the head of the family, and as natural guardian of the widow, to an adoption in his lifetime,¹⁰ would validate an adoption by the widow of a member of the undivided family. The rules as to the nature and sufficiency of the consent required for the adoption by a widow governed by the Dravida school¹ apparently apply to the case of adoption in an undivided family governed by the Maharashtra school of law.

Where the family is divided, an elder widow can adopt without the consent of the junior widow;² but not so as to divest property which has vested in the younger widow as heir to a son.³ The junior widow cannot adopt without the consent of the senior widow,⁴ unless, perhaps, where the latter be incapacitated, as where she is leading an irregular life.⁵

A joint adoption by the widows seems possible.⁶

According to the Mithila school, a widow cannot under any circumstances adopt a son to her husband.⁷ She can under that school adopt a son to herself in the Kritima form.⁸

In the Punjab the custom varies in different localities.⁹

any rate, she has attained sufficient maturity of understanding to comprehend the nature of the act.¹ The same rule would apparently also apply to an adoption under the Dravida school with the authority of the sapindas,² and to a case under the Maharashtra school, where similar authority had been given. It is apparently unsettled whether a minor widow can, in a case governed by the Maharashtra school, act upon the implied authority of her husband.³

can adopt.

A widow cannot adopt unless she be the widow of the last full owner,⁴ or the estate is vested in her as heir to her son, legitimate or adopted, who has died unmarried, or has left no child or widow surviving him,⁵ or (it is submitted) if the circumstances be such that the estate will vest in the adopted son on his adoption.⁶

A. 6, where a Hindu, governed by the Bengal school of law, left his property to a boy to be adopted by the widow of his son, who had predeceased him. In this case the boy took under the will, but the Court treated the adoption as valid, and in Deeno Moyce Dossee (Sreemutty) v. Tarachurn Koondoo Chowdhry (1865), Bourke A. O. C. 48; 3 W. R. M. There might also be the case of a woman taking as heir of her son's son.

ancestral estate is vested in* the mother-in-law by reason of her son predeceasing his father, it would appear that both the mother-in-law and daughter-in-law are competent to adopt. What has been laid down is that the adoptive father's estate must be vested in the adopting widow, in order that an adoption made by her may be valid. If the daughter-in-law adopts first, then the mother-in-law cannot make an adoption during the life of the son adopted by the daughter-in-law, for the father-in-law cannot under that circumstance be considered as destitute of male issue, there being that grandson by adoption in existence. But if the mother-in-law adopts first, then the daughter-in-law cannot be precluded thereby from making an adoption for the spiritual benefit of her husband who would not be benefitted by his mother's adoption. This distinction would apply to all similar cases in all the schools." It is submitted that having regard to the above-mentioned decisions, the daughter-in-law cannot so adopt.

of power.

A widow's power to adopt is at an end for all purposes as soon as the estate of her husband is vested in an heir⁵ (other than herself⁶), of his natural or adopted⁷ son, or of his son's son,⁸ or son's son's son who has inherited to him, and is not revived by the death of such heir, even when on such death she herself succeeds to the property which was of her husband, and therefore by adopting, divests no estate but her own.¹

This rule applies, whether there be an express power given by the husband, or such power be implied,² as in the Maharashtra school, or the power be exerciseable with the consent of the sapindas.³

It is unsettled whether this rule applies in its entirety to an adoption ^{Jains.} by a Jain widow, who can adopt without the consent of her husband.⁴ It has been so applied in Bombay,⁵ but in Calcutta it has been held⁶ that a Jain widow in whom the estate was vested can adopt, although her husband's adopted son has died leaving a son as his heir. Although the decision rested on the distinction between the power of a Jain widow and that of the widow of an ordinary Hindu, the Court seems to have acted on the view of the decision in Bhoobunmoyee's case,⁷ which was accepted by the Calcutta High Court in Puddo Kumaree Debee v. Juggut Kishore Acharjee,⁸ but which was not accepted by the Judicial Committee in the appeal from that decision.⁹

complete ceremonial capacity,¹ or had been married,² but this extension has not been recognized.³

Surrender of estate.

It may be a question whether the power to adopt would not be at an end when the widow has divested herself of the estate by surrender, or authorized alienation.⁴

Joint family.

It is submitted that in the case of a joint family governed by the Mitakshara law, the power of a widow to adopt extends until partition.⁵

Remarriage.

A widow by remarriage loses her power to take in adoption.⁶

Unchaste widow.

It is unsettled whether an unchaste widow can adopt.

In Sayamalal Dutt v. Saudamini Dasi,⁷ Norman, J., held that an unchaste widow, who was pregnant by the man with whom she was living in a state of concubinage, and who had not performed any expiation, could not take in adoption. This decision was based upon the alleged necessity for the performance of religious ceremonies, but, as the parties were Sudras, it is clear⁸ that no religious ceremonies were necessary, and it is therefore doubtful whether this decision can be viewed as an authority. Where religious ceremonies are unnecessary (and it is by no means clear that in any case religious ceremonies are requisite in the case of adoption by a widow⁹), there seems to be no other authority prohibiting adoption by an unchaste widow. If she be not actually pregnant, she can remove the bar, if it be one, by expiation.¹⁰

As a widow adopts, not for her own benefit, but for that of her deceased husband, it may seem hard that her want of chastity should deprive him of the benefits which, according to Hindu ideas, accrue to him from an adoption.

Ceremonial impurity.

The question whether a widow, who is in a state of ceremonial impurity from the death or birth of a relation, and who has not performed the necessary expiation, is competent to adopt, is apparently the same as the question whether a man can under such circumstances adopt.¹

If she can, as apparently she can, depute a relation to perform such ceremonies, if any, as may be necessary,² there can be no objection to an adoption by her. There is, moreover, a question whether any religious ceremonies are necessary in the case of an adoption by a widow.³ If none are necessary, her ceremonial impurity cannot affect the adoption.

A widow's power of adoption cannot be exercised unless the circumstances are such as would have justified an adoption by her husband, if alive. Adoption only valid if husband could have adopted.

Thus she could not adopt a boy whom her husband could not have adopted, and she cannot adopt so long as a son, son's son, son's son's son of her husband be in existence.⁴ During that time her power of adoption is in suspense.⁵

"It follows on principle that a man cannot delegate to others, to be exercised after his death, any greater power than he himself possessed in his lifetime."⁶

A widow is under no legal obligation to exercise a power of adoption.⁷ An express direction by the husband cannot be enforced,⁸ even if he directed the adoption of a No obligation to adopt.

particular boy.¹ The widow does not, by the non-exercise of the power, forfeit any of her rights as widow,² or mother.³

In a case where the husband has power to deal with property by will there is nothing apparently to prevent him from enforcing the exercise of a power of adoption by a gift over of his property to some one other than the widow, in the event of the power not being exercised within a specified time.

Until she actually adopts, a widow can exercise no rights on behalf of the boy, the adoption of whom she is contemplating.⁴

Agreement not to adopt.

It is unsettled whether a covenant by a widow not to adopt is valid.⁵

Such question might depend upon the nature of the power (if any).⁶

It is submitted that she could not be restrained from exercising a power, which is given to her, not for her own benefit, but for that of her husband.

CAPACITY TO GIVE IN ADOPTION.

The natural father⁷ can give in adoption where there is no dissent by the mother, and, even in case of such dissent, the weight of authority is in favour of the father's power to give his son in adoption.

⁷ An adoptive father cannot give in adoption. See post, p. 149.

In Narayanasami v. Kuppusami (1887), 11 Mad. 43, at p. 47, it is said, "Where there is a competition between the father and mother, the former has a predominant interest or a potential voice."

Mr. Mayne says,¹ "It is quite settled that the father alone has absolute authority to dispose of his son in adoption, even without the consent of his wife, though her consent is generally sought and obtained." He cites two cases. In one (Alank Manjari v. Fakir Chand Sarkar (1834), 5 Ben. Sel. R. 356 (new edition, 418)), the question was as to the adoptive mother's consent, which is a different question from the present one. In the other (Chitko Raghunath Rajadiksh v. Janaki (1874), 11 Bom. H. C. 199), the question did not arise, but (at p. 202) the Court says, "In the eye of Hindu law, when a man gives his son in adoption, he would seem to exercise a power, more like the power of an absolute proprietor than of a guardian."

Sastri G. C. Sircar² contends that the abolition of slavery has impliedly destroyed a Hindu father's absolute dominion over his son, and concludes, "The proper view to take, therefore, seems to be that the father alone is incompetent to give when the mother is opposed to it, and that such gift is not void, but voidable only at the instance of the mother."

Nanda Pandita³ contends that unless the mother consents, the adoption does not affect the boy's relationship to his maternal relations. It is scarcely likely that this view would now be taken by the Courts.

A mother can, during the father's lifetime, with his Mother. consent, give her son in adoption.⁴

On the death of the father, or on his being permanently absent from home, or on his entering a religious order, or losing his reason, or otherwise becoming incapable of giving his consent, a mother can give her son in authorize another person to perform the physical act of giving a son in adoption to a named person.¹

It is not settled whether a minor father or mother can give his or her son in adoption. Gift of son by minor.

The Hindu law books do not expressly prohibit a minor from giving a son in adoption.² This is probably for the reason that the event would be unlikely to occur. The question apparently stands upon the same footing as the capacity to take in adoption,³ and, at any rate, a father who has not attained the age of discretion⁴ would apparently be incompetent to give his son in adoption. As a Hindu minor⁵ cannot make a will, and apparently cannot appoint a testamentary guardian, it would seem unlikely that he would have power to dispose of a child, in respect of whose custody after his death he could make no provision.

There seems no reason why an adult father could not give to his minor widow power to dispose of his son in adoption.

It has been held that a Hindu father, at any rate if he is not a Brahmin, does not lose his capacity to give his son in adoption by reason of his conversion to Mahomedanism.⁶ Abandonment of Hinduism.

In this case the child had remained a Hindu. If the child had also become a Mahomedan, the Hindu law of adoption would have been inapplicable. In spite of the above decision, there is a question whether a father, who has by his conversion adopted a system of law which does not recognize the adoption of sons, can retain a portion of the system which he has repudiated.⁷ Act XXI. of 1850 merely destroys the effect of any law or usage which inflicts a forfeiture of rights or property upon persons changing their religion. In this case the forfeiture, if it can be so described, does not arise from any law or usage. There is, it is submitted, an abandonment of a right, by virtue of the voluntary assumption of other rights which are inconsistent with such rights. The above decision is based upon authorities which deal with the right of custody, which was a right known both to the system abandoned, and to the system adopted.

A father, who becomes a Brahmo, does not lose his right to give his son in adoption.¹

Remarriage of widow.

A widow by remarriage loses her power to give her son in adoption, even when she belongs to a caste in which remarriage is customary.²

Where the father has expressly authorized his widow to give in adoption, remarriage would not necessarily have the same effect,³ and apparently it would not affect the authority, where the parties belong to a caste in which remarriage is customary.

WHO MAY BE TAKEN IN ADOPTION.

Identity of class.

The boy must belong to the same primary caste⁴ as that of his adoptive father.⁵

For instance, a Brahmin cannot adopt a Kshatriya or a Sudra.

The reason for this rule is that the adoptive father could not have married the natural mother, when a virgin, as she belonged to a different class.⁶

There seems to be nothing to prevent an adoption of a boy belonging to a different subdivision of the Sudra class,⁷ as the weight of authority is in favour of the legality of a marriage between persons belonging to different subdivisions of that class.⁸

No preferential right.

No boy has a preferential or any right to be adopted, and there is nothing to prevent the adoption of a stranger, even though there be a near relation qualified for adoption.

⁸ Ante, p. 33.

The texts which prescribe the preferential adoption of a supinda have not the force of law.¹

Among the three twice-born classes, no one whose mother, when she was a virgin,² the adoptive father (or the husband of a widow taking a boy in adoption), was by reason of propinquity barred from legally marrying, can be adopted.³

Relationship of adoptive father to natural mother.

This rule in its present form was first enunciated by Mr. Sutherland in his "Synopsis."⁴ He deduced this rule from a rule which had reference to the obsolete practice of niyoga, which, when used in this sense, means the appointment of a kinsman to raise up issue by the wife of a childless husband, or of one deceased without leaving children.⁵

A text of Saunaka⁶ requires the boy adopted to bear "the reflection of a son." Nanda Pundita⁷ in construing this text, held that the resemblance must consist in "the capability to have sprung from (the adopter) himself, through an appointment (to raise up issue on another's wife), and so forth,"⁸ as (in the case) of the son, of a brother, a near or distant kinsman, and so forth."

As the practice of niyoga is now obsolete,¹ the rules by which it was regulated in respect of the person selected for appointment are not, as such, now used for the purpose of testing the capability of the person to be adopted, but in their place the rules as to the prohibited degrees in the case of marriage have been substituted.

The two sets of rules have been held not to conflict,² but they do not appear to completely coincide.³ "Prohibited connection in the case of marriage has reference to the relationship in which the couple between whom marriage is proposed stand, irrespective of marriage, and when the girl selected for marriage is a maiden. But prohibited connection in the case of niyoga has reference to the relationship between a married woman and the person who is appointed to beget a child upon her. . . . The rules of prohibited connection had a common object in both cases, viz. the prevention of incest.

In the case of marriage, there are three prohibitions,⁴ viz.—

(i.) The couple between whom marriage is proposed should not be sapindas ;

(ii.) They should not be sagotras ; and

(iii.) There should be no Viruddha Sambandha or contrary relationship, that is, such relationship as would render sexual connection between them incestuous. This contrary relationship is defined as consisting in the couple being so related to each other that by analogy the one is the father or the mother of the other, as, for instance, the daughter of the wife's sister and the sister of the paternal uncle's wife."⁵

According to the niyoga rule, "The relations prohibited for adoption by a man are : the paternal uncle, the maternal uncle, the brother, the four first cousins on paternal and maternal side, the brother-in-law, the sister's son, and the daughter's son."⁶

Of these the father's brother's son, and the mother's son,⁷ would not be excluded by the marriage rules.

Whatever may have been the origin of the marriage rule, it has been held in Madras that the Courts cannot now go behind it and test the validity of an adoption by the rules which governed the obsolete system of niyoga.⁸

It remains to be seen whether the Judicial Committee will, when it becomes necessary to lay down a general rule on this subject, accept the rule of prohibited degrees in marriage laid down in India, or will accept the niyoga rule, enunciated in the "Dattaka Mimansa," or will confine the prohibitions to the three cases which have hitherto been considered by the Committee,¹ viz. those of the sister's son, daughter's son, and mother's sister's son. These are the only cases specified by the sages Saunaka and Sakala, from whose texts Nanda Pandita, in the "Dattaka Mimansa," based the niyoga test of exclusion.

The high authority of the "Dattaka Mimansa"² might possibly give a preference to the niyoga test of exclusion; but with regard to the analogy between the Dattaka form of adoption and this obsolete practice the Judicial Committee has said,³ "as a ground for judicial decision these speculations are inadmissible, though as explanatory arguments to account for an actual practice they may be deserving of attention."

The burden of proving a special custom to the contrary amongst any members of these three classes, prevalent, either in their caste, or in a particular locality, lies upon him who avers the existence of that custom.⁴

In the following cases, which fall within the above-mentioned rule, adoptions have been held to be invalid. Instances of application of rule.

A sister's daughter's son would be inadmissible for adoption.¹

Such adoption is permissible in the Telugu and Tamil country, where a marriage between a maternal uncle and his niece is allowed.²

(c) Mother's sister's son.³

(d) The son of the daughter of a sagotra.⁴

It seems that the adoptions of the following are prohibited, not by the marriage rule, which is inapplicable, but by express authority, viz. :—

(i.) Brother.⁵

In the Deccan the adoption of a younger brother is permitted.⁶

(ii.) Stepbrother.⁷

(iii.) Paternal and maternal uncles.⁸

Having regard to the prohibition as to the age⁹ of the adopted son, this case is unlikely to occur except, perhaps, in Western India.¹⁰

It has been held that the adoptions of the following persons are permissible, except in the case where the natural mother of the boy happens to be a person whom, as a virgin, the adoptive father could not lawfully have married.

(a) Brother's son's son.¹¹

Such marriage seems to have been permissible by a usage to which the parties were subject.

This is in accordance with the views now adopted by all the High Courts at Allahabad,¹ Madras,² and Bombay.³ The question does not seem to have been decided by the High Court of Bengal.

Nanda Pandita held that a woman must not adopt her brother's son.⁴ His view was accepted in two cases.⁵ It is supported by Dr. Jogendronath Bhattacharya, who carries the rule to its logical conclusion, and in the case of an adoption by a woman excludes from adoption the sons of men between whom and her there could be no legal niyoga or appointment to raise issue.⁶ This is also the opinion of Sastri Gopal Chundra Sircar.⁷

There is no ground for holding that the adoption of a relation is limited to a particular generation.⁸

No restriction
as to generation.

In the Punjab no adoption is rendered invalid by any relationship between the adopting and natural parents.⁹

Jains.

Jains are apparently not bound by any restrictions as to the relationship between adopter and adopted.¹

Among Jains a daughter's son may be adopted.²

Adoption from adoptive family.

An adopted son cannot adopt from his adoptive family a boy whom he could not have adopted if he had been a natural son of his adoptive father.³

Only son.

An only son, or any one of several sons, can be adopted.⁴

A widow can give her only son in adoption.⁵

There was for a long time a conflict in the Indian Courts as to whether an only son could be given in adoption,⁶ but in 1899 it was definitely settled that he could be so given. The power to adopt an elder or any one of several sons was settled much earlier.⁷

It was not necessary to decide in Balusu Gurulingaswami's case whether a widow would have power to give an only son in adoption. In Somasekhara Raja v. Subhadramaji (1882), 6 Bom.

524, following Lokshmappa v. Ramava (1875), 12 Bom. H. C. 364, at p. 396, it was held that an authority by the husband to give in adoption, even as a deyanashayana (post, pp. 194, 195), would not be implied in the case of the adoption of an only son. See also Debec Dial v. Hur Hor Singh (1828), 4 Ben. Sel. R. 320 (new edition, 407). The decision in *Krishna v. Western India. In Western India there is no objection to the adoption of a married man even if he has children.¹

It has been held that a married Sudra of a different gotra can be adopted,² and the adoption of a married Brahmin of a different gotra, having children at the date of his adoption has been upheld.³ When he is of the same gotra it follows that there can be no objection.⁴

boy and adopter.

The rule of Hindu law requiring a difference of age between the adoptive father or mother and the boy,⁵ is apparently merely directory.⁶

If a boy, eligible in other respects, upon whom the ceremonies of chulakarma (tonsure) and upanayana (investiture with the sacred thread) have not been performed in his natural family, can be obtained, he should be preferred, but the fact that such ceremonies have been performed does not invalidate the adoption.⁷

Punjab.

In the Punjab there is no limit of age, and the performance of the thread ceremony or of marriage in the family does not invalidate the adoption.⁸

Jains.

Among Jains there is no limit of age,⁹ and a married man may be adopted.¹⁰

Orphan.

An orphan, whether he be a minor or an adult, cannot be adopted.¹¹

This follows from the rule that only a father or mother can give in adoption.¹²

A boy who has been taken in adoption, cannot be taken again in adoption.¹

Two persons, even if they are brothers, cannot take the same person in adoption, either at the same time² or at different times.³

Where a boy is disqualified by personal defects from inheriting, it is not settled whether he can be adopted.⁴

A defect which would attach to the boy in consequence of a fault on the part of his parents would not operate as a disqualification.⁵

There is no objection to the adoption of the Brahmo son of a Brahmo. Brahmo.⁶

The simultaneous adoption of two or more sons is invalid as to all.⁷

The practice of simultaneous adoptions of two or more sons seems to have been prevalent in Bengal after 1846, and to have owed its origin to the ingenuity of Hindu lawyers, who attempted thereby to evade the effect of the decision of the Privy Council in Rungama v. Atchama,⁸ in which an adoption during the lifetime of a previously adopted son was declared void.⁹

It may in some cases be difficult to determine whether the adoptions were simultaneous, and, therefore, both void, or merely successive, in which case the latter only would be void.

In Siddessory Dassee v. Doorgachurn Sett,¹ Phear, J., said, "But, moreover, on that occasion, the ceremonies for the two boys were carried on, practically speaking, simultaneously, although possibly the beginnings and endings were not absolutely synchronous. If either boy was adopted, both were adopted, and it would be an outrage to common sense to say otherwise than that they were adopted at one and the same time."

ACT OF ADOPTION.

Giving and
sary.

There must in every case be an actual corporeal gift and acceptance of the boy in adoption,² coupled with an expression of the intention of the one person to give, and of the other to accept, the boy in adoption.³

A mere gift by a document transferring the boy,⁴ or a constructive gift of an absent boy,⁵ or an expression of assent⁶ or intention⁷ without an actual gift is insufficient.

A deed or other writing in support of the act of adoption is unnecessary,¹ but in cases to which the Oudh Estate Act, 1869,² applies, an adoption by a widow must be by a writing executed and attested in manner required in case of a will,³ and registered.⁴

Writing unnecessary.
Adoptions in Oudh.

Although it is usual to invite relations to the performance of the ceremonies, and, in the case of large landowners, to represent the fact of the adoption to the Government authorities, the absence of such invitation or representation does not vitiate the adoption.⁵ The consent of the ruling authority is not necessary,⁶ unless it be a condition of the exercise of a permission to adopt.⁷

Invitations, etc.

The person giving in adoption ought not to receive any consideration for the adoption; but it has been held that if he does so the adoption is not void.⁸

Consideration or gift in adoption.

A contract to pay money in consideration of giving a son in adoption cannot be enforced.⁹

The receipt of a sum of money by the widow from the natural father does not affect the adoption.¹⁰ As to an arrangement made by a widow to reserve the property of her husband for herself, see post, pp. 188, 189.

has apparently no power to impose a condition invalidating the adoption on the happening or non-happening of a future event; but in giving to his wife permission to give in adoption, he may subject the exercise of that power to a condition, and unless that condition be substantially fulfilled the gift has no effect.¹

If the condition be an illegal or immoral one, the gift would be effectual even though the condition be not performed.

It is by no means clear what effect upon the boy's position in his natural family would be caused by an adoption upon a condition which is not fulfilled.

There may be a question as to whether the amount of mental capacity which is requisite in the case of a will⁴ is necessary for the taking a child in adoption,⁵ as the taking in adoption is a matter of religious necessity.⁶

otherwise than by the free consent of the persons giving and taking in adoption, it is voidable.¹ It can be ratified subsequently if no one's interest is prejudicially affected by such ratification.²

Where the adopter is a young widow, the Court will require clear evidence that, at the time of adoption, she was fully informed of her rights, and of the effect of adoption.³ There will, however, be some relaxation of the strictness of this rule where the husband has directed his wife to adopt.⁴

Where a person who has attained the age of majority⁵ is adopted, his assent would apparently be essential to the adoption. In other cases no such assent is necessary.⁶

contemplated ceremonies in consequence of death, or of some other cause, may be evidence to show that the adoption is incomplete.

Twice-born classes.

The performance of the *datta homam*¹ is apparently necessary in the case of the twice-born classes, at any rate where the boy is not of the same gotra as the adoptive father.

Boy of same gotra.

Where the boy is of the same gotra as the adoptive father, as, for instance, where he is a brother's son, according to the law prevalent in the Presidencies of Bombay and Madras, no religious ceremonies are necessary.²

Bengal.

In Bengal this distinction has not been made.³

There is not very much direct authority on the question whether the absence of religious ceremonies in any case invalidates an adoption among the twice-born classes. In an old case the Judicial Committee said,⁴ "Although neither written acknowledgments nor the performance of any religious ceremonials are essential to the validity of adoptions;" but it does not appear that the question as to the necessity of religious ceremonies was raised in that case.

In reference to these remarks the Judicial Committee said in a subsequent case,⁵ "It cannot, however, be considered as more than a dictum, since the decision was against the adoption in fact."

In a still later case, where the parties were Sudras, the Judicial Committee said,⁶ "It is perfectly clear that amongst the twice-born classes there would be no such adoption by deed, because certain Govind Rao Bulcant Rao Mankur* (1820), 2 Borr. 75, at pp. 85, 87.

³ A suggestion of a distinction on this ground was made in Nittianand Ghose v. Krishna Dyal Ghose (1871), 7 B. L. R. 1, at p. 5; 15 W. R. C. R. 300, at p. 301, where the parties were Sudras, and the question was not decided. In Atma Ram v. Madho Rao (1884), 6 All. 276, at p. 279, Stuart, C.J., considered that the distinction was one of general application. Sastri G. C. Sircar ("Law of Adoption," p. 382) repudiates the distinction.

religious ceremonies, the datta homam in particular, are in their case requisite." *

Although it has been considered that this expression of opinion decides the question,¹ "it is doubtful if more was intended than to point out that such religious ceremonies are requisite as part of the purely ceremonial law, not that the validity of an adoption for civil purposes depends on their due observance."²

At any rate, so far as the Judicial Committee is concerned, there are only contradictory dicta on the subject, with the exception above named.

The High Courts have accepted the view that the performance of the datta homam is necessary,³ but in one case only⁴ has a High Court, so far as the writer can ascertain, set aside an adoption on the ground that religious ceremonies had not been performed.

It has been suggested⁵ that adoption by a widow perhaps stands on a different footing, as, "according to the sages, the twice-born females hold the same position as Sudras with respect to the performance of religious ceremonies," but this distinction is not made by the cases which hold that religious ceremonies are necessary in the case of an adoption in one of the regenerate classes. In some of those cases⁶ the adoption was made by a widow.

Nambudri Brahmins.

No ceremonies are necessary in an adoption in the dwyamushyayana form among the Nambudri Brahmins.¹

Time of per-
homa.

The homa ceremony may be performed at any time after the actual giving and taking, and it does not seem to be necessary that the father should perform it. When the homa is necessary, the adoption is not complete until it is performed. Its performance after the death of the natural father,² or of the adoptive father,³ does not invalidate the adoption.

Place of performance.

Although it is usual to perform the homa in the dwelling-house of the adopter,⁴ it is immaterial where the ceremony is performed.⁵

ceremonies.

There seems to be nothing to prevent the natural and adoptive parents delegating to others the performance of the homa ceremony.⁶

ceremonies.

Although other religious ceremonies may be usual, it does not appear that the absence of them invalidates an adoption.⁷

Requirements of valid
adoption.

Provided the above rules as to the capacity to take in adoption, the capacity to give in adoption, the capacity to be taken in adoption, and as to the act of adoption, are followed, an adoption is valid; otherwise it is void.⁸

Bhaya Gayal (1871), 16 W. R. C. R. 179, the Court held that the performance of the putresti jag (sacrifice for male issue) is essential to the validity of an adoption among the three superior castes. G. C. Sircar ("Law of Adoption," p. 383) suggests that the words "putresti jag" were in the judgment in that case by mistake substituted for "datta homam," as the putresti jag is only necessary when the ceremony of tonsure has been performed in the natural family ("Dattaka Mimamsa," s. 4, paras. 32, 49).

is authority to the contrary to be found in decisions of the same Court.¹

It is submitted, that although the consent may have the effect of estopping the person adopting from denying the adoption,² it cannot otherwise affect the validity of the adoption.

In one instance it has been said that consent validates an otherwise invalid adoption. In the "Dattaka Mimansa,"³ it is said that a second son may be adopted⁴ with the sanction of the existing issue, and in *Rungama v. Atchama*⁵ this seems to have been accepted, although it became unnecessary to decide the question, but the Courts have not in any subsequent case upheld such adoption, and there are great difficulties in the way of giving effect to any such consent, as no provision seems to be made for the division of the property in that event.

As to consent to the divesting of estates on adoption, see post, p. 201.

Acquiescence. Whatever may be the effect of consent to an adoption, active acquiescence may, in certain circumstances, operate as an estoppel,⁶ but passive acquiescence cannot alter rights, unless it extend to the period provided by the law of limitation.⁷ It may, however, be some evidence of the fact of the adoption.⁸

Cancellation or Renunciation. An adoption once validly made cannot be cancelled by the natural or adoptive parents,⁹ or renounced by the adopted son.¹⁰

There is nothing to prevent an adopted son renouncing any interest in property which would come to him as such.¹¹

* KRITIMA FORM OF ADOPTION.

In the district of Mithila, or Tirhoot,¹ where it is the prevailing form,² and in the adjoining districts,³ a form of adoption called the *Kritima*⁴ is practised, and is recognized by the law. Adoption in Kritima form.

This form of adoption is not to be confounded with the adoption of a Kritima son according to the Smritis and commentaries. The latter held the same position as a Dattaka son, and the ceremonies and conditions were apparently identical in both cases. The Kritima form of adoption which prevailed throughout India has long been obsolete.

The modern form of Kritima adoption is based upon recent authorities, and is said to owe its origin to the prohibition⁵ of adoption by a widow in the Mithila country.⁶

Either a man or a woman can adopt in this form, provided he or she has no son,⁷ grandson, or great grandson in existence. Who can adopt.

A wife or widow so adopting does not require the assent of her husband or of his kinsmen,⁸ and she cannot adopt a son to her husband in this form, even if she receives his permission.⁹

There is nothing to prevent a dattaka adoption in the Mithila district by a man, Sircar's "Law of Adoption," p. 447; but a widow cannot adopt in that form according to the Mithila school.

³ G. C. Sircar's "Law of Adoption," p. 448. In a note to Srinath Serma v. Radhakant (1796), 1 Ben. Sel. R. 15, at p. 16 (new edition, 19, at p. 21), it is said that this form of adoption "is in use in North Behar, and the contiguous districts of Baglipore (Bhaughulpore) and Purnea."

A husband and wife can adopt jointly, or they may each adopt a separate son under this form.¹

Who may be adopted.

Except that he must belong to the same class² as the person adopting him, there is no restriction as to the person to be adopted.³

Relationship.

The relationship of the adopter and the adopted does not, it is submitted, affect the validity of the adoption.

In Purmessur Dutt Jha (Chowdree) v. Hunooman Dutt Roy,⁴ the adoption of a sister's son by a Brahmin in the Kritima form was upheld, but in an earlier case,⁵ the adoption of an elder brother by a younger brother was held invalid.

In Nunkoo Singh v. Purm Dhun Singh,⁶ an adoption of a sister's son in the Kritima form was upheld, but on the ground that the parties did not belong to one of the regenerate classes.

According to the Dvaita-Parishishta of Kesaba Misra, a pundit of Mithila, even a father or a brother may be adopted.⁷

Sir William Macnaghten considers that there is no restriction except as to tribe,⁸ but Sastri G. C. Sircar⁹ contends that the rule as to relationship applicable to an adoption in the Dattaka form¹⁰ are equally applicable to an adoption in the Kritima form.

Age.

The age of the son adopted in this form is immaterial.¹¹

The performance of the initiatory ceremonies in the natural family,¹² or the marriage,¹³ does not prevent the adoption.

Consent.

The consent of the adopted son,¹⁴ and the consent (or at any rate the absence of the express dissent) of his parents,¹ if living, is necessary to this form of adoption.

The relationship being one created by contract, the consent of all the necessary parties must coincide. An assent given by the son after the death of the adoptive father to an adoption to which the adoptive father assented before his death will not be sufficient.²

No ceremonies are necessary,³ and no particular form Ceremonies. is required to be observed.

Colebrooke⁴ cites from "Rudradhara in the Suddhiviveka," the following :—

"The form to be observed is this. At an auspicious time, the adopter of a son having bathed, addressing the person to be adopted, who has also bathed, and to whom he has given some acceptable chattel, says, 'Be my son.' He replies, 'I am become thy son.' The giving of some chattel arises merely from custom. It is not necessary to the adoption. The consent of both parties is the only requisite; and a set form of speech is not essential."⁵

A Kritima adoption, when once validly made, cannot be revoked.⁶

SOME OTHER SPECIAL AND LOCAL FORMS OF ADOPTION.

In the district of Gya there is amongst the Gyawal Brahmins a Gyawals. practice of adoption in a form which is similar to the Kritima form. It is purely contractual, and does not affect the position of the adopted son in his natural family.⁷

adoption.

Among the Reddi caste¹ it is customary for a man who has no son² to affiliate a son-in-law by what is called an *Illatom*³ adoption.

This custom prevails in the Bellary, Kurnool, Cuddapah, Nellore, and North and South Arcot districts,⁴ but not among the Kondarazu caste of the Vizagapatam district.⁵

There is no mention of this form of adoption in the Digests, and there are few decided cases on the subject.⁶ It is necessary to determine each case according to the evidence as to the custom, and its effects which may be brought forward.⁷

It is uncertain whether a man having a son can affiliate a son-in-law in this form of adoption,⁸ whether the affiliation is affected by the introduction into the family, or requires for its completion marriage with a daughter, and whether, if the father be dead, the right may be exercised by a surviving paternal grandfather.

adoption.

A son-in-law so adopted stands for purposes of inheritance in the place of a son, and in competition with natural born sons,⁹ or sons adopted in the Dattaka form,¹⁰ takes an equal share.

Inheritance.

He does not lose any of his rights of inheritance in his natural family,¹¹ nor do the members of his natural family lose their rights of succession to him.¹²

Disposition.

An illatom son-in-law can deal with property acquired by him as such in the same way as he can deal with any other self-acquired property. His sons have no right therein by virtue of their birth.¹³

Heirs.

The property received by the illatom son-in-law as such passes to his heirs in the same way as self-acquired property.¹⁴ The heirs of the adopter have no right in it.

It is uncertain whether a son-in-law so adopted obtains a right to ^{Right to} insist upon a partition of ancestral property during the father's lifetime.¹ partition.
He apparently cannot do so, as it has been held that there is no right of survivorship between him and an adopted son living in commensality with him,² and the interest acquired by the illatom son-in-law is to be treated as self-acquired property.³ ^{Right of survivorship.}

The taking of a son-in-law in illatom adoption does not prevent the subsequent adoption of a Dattaka son.⁴

In Nair families governed by the Marumakkathayam rule of Malabar law, inheritance, the right (and perhaps duty) to adopt females into the family or taravad is vested in the karnavan, or head of a family, but he cannot, in the absence of proof of custom to that effect, adopt either without consulting the co-sharers, or in case it be essential to the preservation of the taravad.⁵ It cannot be so essential until the last possible karnavan has been reached. ^{Marumakkathayam system.}

Under the Aliyasanta system the last female member of the family cannot adopt a daughter without the consent of her son.⁶

As to the law of adoption in Malabar, see Wigram's "Malabar Law and Customs," pp. 11-14.

In families governed by the Makkatayam ⁷ rule of inheritance, there are three systems of adoption.⁸ ^{Makkatayam system.}

follows: "On failure of the sister's progeny, male and female, the head of the family may make adoption. The descent being in the female line, the adoption must be of a female. In view of the probable minority of her offspring at the period when the management may fall in, a male, her brother, may be taken in adoption at the same time with herself, in order to afford provision for the administration of the affairs of the family, and for conduct of the religious rites to be observed therein."

Wigram says that this form is probably almost identical with the ordinary Hindu adoption.¹ It is called pattukayyal dattu.²

(b) Adoption by Chamatha, i.e. by burning a piece of sacred grass.³

(c) The third form is akin to the Kritima form. It is "commonly adopted by Brahmin widows and Sudras for the purpose of perpetuating the family when it is in danger of becoming extinct. There is no limit as to age or number of persons adopted. The only limit seems to be that the person or persons adopted should be of the same vansham or tribe as the adopter. Among Sudras the adoption should be of one or more females, but it is frequently accompanied by the adoption of a male for the purpose of providing for the future management of the adopter's property. Sometimes a whole family of adults is adopted."⁴

Nambudris.

The practice among Nambudris, that only the eldest marries, necessarily limits the right of adoption to his line.⁵ "But if there be any male relative at all, however distant, then he is not entitled to the right of adopting. The nearest and oldest relative must be made to marry, and thus preserve the family continuity. But if there should be no prospect of his brothers getting issue, and if they should give their consent to the act, then he may have recourse to an adoption, to which the consent of the other relatives is not necessary. If, however, he adopts one of his distant relatives, in that case the consent of all his other relations, however distant, will be necessary."⁶

Among the Nambudri Brahmins,⁷ a widow can adopt or appoint an heir in order to perpetuate her illam,⁸ in the absence of dayadies,⁹ whose relationship is the cause of two or three days' pollution,¹⁰ or with their consent.¹¹ It is usual, but apparently not indispensable in such case, to require the person so adopted or appointed to marry for the purpose of continuing the illam.¹² There is, apparently, no limit of age.¹³

There seems also to have been, or to be, a custom that if a Nambudri widow defects a person to marry to raise up issue for her illam, the status of the son in the illam for which he is begotten, is that of a son obtained in gift by adoption.¹

It is unsettled whether the Courts will recognize the common practice of dancing-girls and prostitutes to adopt daughters, but except where the child has been taken in such a way as to make her reception punishable by the Criminal law, it is submitted that there is no reason why the Courts should not give effect to such usage.²

In cases of adoption, prior to the coming into force of the Indian Penal Code,³ the Courts in Madras recognized the custom,⁴ but declined to extend it by allowing a plurality of adoptions.⁵ It was also held that no ceremonies were necessary, and that mere recognition was sufficient.⁶ Apparently the adoptive mother cannot adopt if she has a daughter. It is immaterial whether she has a son.⁷

In an old case in Bengal⁸ the Court declined to recognize such adoptions, and in a Bombay case,⁹ the report of which does not show when the adoption took place, but where apparently it had taken place before the coming into force of the Indian Penal Code, the Court, in declining to recognize the adoption, gave reasons which are as applicable to cases before that Act came into force as thereafter.

In a later Bombay case, effect was given to an adoption effected by a dying prostitute for the purpose of providing for the performance of her funeral ceremonies, and the inheritance of her property.¹⁰

In cases where a minor under the age of sixteen years has been sold or otherwise disposed of, or received with intent that she shall be employed or used for the purpose of prostitution (and this generally happens in the cases of so-called adoptions by dancing-girls¹¹) the disposition or reception of the girl is punishable by the Penal Code,¹² and therefore, as being prohibited by law, no effect can be given to it by the Court.¹

In Venku v. Mahalinga,² Muttusami Ayyar, J., said, "We may set aside or decline to enforce a contract or disposition which has for its immediate object the prostitution of a minor during her minority so as to leave her no choice of married life when she is over sixteen years. The policy of the Penal Code, as it seems to me, is not to obliterate altogether the line of distinction between the province of ethics and that of law, but to protect the chastity of minors and to assume to them the freedom of choosing married life when they attain their age, whether they are the natural or adopted daughters of dancing women, and to leave otherwise the incidents of their legal status as daughters untouched, whether the parties concerned are dancing women or ordinary Hindus."

Effect was given to an adoption by a prostitute dancing-girl in Narasanna v. Gangu.³

DISPUTES AS TO ADOPTION.

Suits in which question of adoption arises.

A question as to the factum or validity of an adoption would arise in a suit or other proceeding in which the alleged adopted son is asserting his title as such, or in a suit brought against him for the purpose of disputing his title as an adopted son, or in a suit to recover property held by him by virtue of such alleged title, or in a suit for the purpose of preventing him from acting as adopted son.⁴

Who is entitled to dispute adoption.

An alleged adoption may be disputed by any person whose interests are affected by it.⁵

Adoption by widow.

A suit to declare the invalidity of an adoption by a widow can only, as a general rule, be brought by the presumptive reversionary heir.⁶ Such a suit may be brought by a more distant reversioner, if those nearer in succession are in collusion with the widow or have

In case of the widow, or other limited heir,⁵ colluding, or being precluded from interfering, the presumptive reversionary heir may sue, and possibly in case such presumptive reversionary heir is also colluding, a more distant reversioner may sue.⁶

“Any person entitled to any legal character, or to any right as to any property, may institute a suit against any person denying, or interested to deny, his title to such character or right, and the Court may, in its discretion, make therein a declaration that he is so entitled, and the plaintiff need not, in such suit, ask for any further relief. ⁹ I. of 1877. The right to bring a suit to declare an adoption to be invalid independently of a claim to property has been incidentally recognized by the Legislature. See Court Fees Act (VII. of 1870, s. 2, art. 17, cl. 5) and in Limitation Acts (IX. of 1871, Sched. II., art. 129; XV. of 1877, Sched. II., art. 118).

declaration.

Provided that no Court shall make any such declaration where the plaintiff, being able to seek further relief than a mere declaration of title, omits to do so.

Explanation.—A trustee of property is a person interested to deny a title adverse to the title of some one who is not in existence, and for whom, if in existence, he would be a trustee.

Illustration.

A Hindu widow in possession of property adopts a son to her deceased husband. The person presumptively entitled to possession of the property on her death without a son may, in a suit against the adopted son, obtain a declaration that the adoption was invalid.

Suit to deter-
take in adoption.

It is unsettled whether, in exercise of the discretion given to it by the Specific Relief Act,¹ the Court can determine a right to take in adoption before the adoption has taken place.

The High Court of Bengal has held in an unreported case that a suit will lie for a declaration that a permission set up by a widow is false.² The same Court decided in a case under the law before the Specific Relief Act came into force that such suit will not lie,³ relying on the decision of the Judicial Committee in Sree Narain Mitter v. Kishen Soondory Dussee (Sreemutty),⁴ but in the last-named case the suit was merely to set aside certain deeds of gift and acceptance in adoption, under which the defendant took no interest. It may in many cases be desirable that the question should be determined in order to save the parties expense, to save the boy from the peril of his adoption being declared invalid, and to save the estate from the expense of maintaining the boy if the adoption be declared invalid.⁵ On the other hand, the boy would not be bound by the decree, as he could not be a party to such suit.

Injunction.

There seems to have been no case in which an injunction has been granted to restrain the performance of an adoption,¹ but provided the application be made in due time, and there be no objection on the merits, there seems no reason why a Court should not be justified in issuing such injunction.

There is authority that an interim injunction will not be granted to restrain the carrying out of an adoption.²

The Courts will not decree specific performance of an agreement to give or take in adoption,³ but the breach of such agreement would apparently give a right to damages.⁴ Specific performance of agreement.

A decision as to the factum or validity of an adoption will only bind the persons who are parties to such decision and those claiming under them.⁵ Res judicata.

It is unsettled whether a decision as to the fact, or the validity of an adoption in a suit between the alleged adopted son and a person who is, during the lifetime of the widow, the then immediate reversioner, will bind another person who may succeed to the reversion.⁶ The Madras High Court has held that he is bound,⁷ but this is not in accordance with the views of the other High Courts.

When the question is decided, after the death of the widow, in a suit between the adopted son and the person who would in the absence of the adopter be entitled to the reversion after her death, such decision would bind all persons subsequently interested in the estate as they would take through the person then entitled.

(1876), 3 I. A. 72, at p. 84; 1 Calc. 289, at p. 296; 25 W. R. C. R. 235, at p. 239. The fact that a previous suit by a reversioner has been unsuccessful may be a reason for refusing a mere declaratory decree (see ante, p. 167) at the suit of another reversioner. The idea that a decision in a question of adoption had the effect of a judgment in rem was disposed of in Kanhya Lall v. Radha Churn (1867), B. L. R. F. B. R. 662; 7 W. R. C. R. 338. The matter is now dealt with by the Evidence Act (I. of 1872), s. 43.

⁷ Chiruvolu Punnamma v. Chiruvolu Perrazu (1906), 29 Mad. 390.

conducted between the alleged adopted son and the widow in whom the property was vested would, in the case where the adoption was alleged to be made by the widow's husband, bind the reversioners. Probably it would also have the same effect where the adoption is said to have been made by the widow,¹ but she denies it.

A decision against one person claiming to be an adopted son would not bind another person claiming under another act of adoption.²

Under the Specific Relief Act,³ a declaration is only binding on the parties to the suit, persons claiming through them respectively, and where any of the parties are trustees, on the persons for whom, if in existence at the date of the declaration, such parties would be trustees. As these expressions do not include the case of a subsequent reversioner, it seems clear that a declaration, or the refusal to grant one, in a suit by one reversioner does not bind another reversioner.

suit to declare adoption
invalid.

A suit "to obtain a declaration that an alleged adoption is invalid, or never, in fact, took place," must be brought within "six years" from the time "when the alleged adoption becomes known to the plaintiff."⁴

This provision is confined to declaratory suits, and does not alter the limitation for suits for possession of property.⁵

There was a conflict of authority as to whether the effect of this provision is to bar suits for possession of property against a person holding under an alleged adoption which are brought more than six years after the alleged adoption becomes known to the plaintiff, or whether it is confined to cases where a declaration only can be obtained, and there is no present right to substantive relief.⁶

former effect, but in Calcutta¹ and Allahabad² a contrary view was expressed.

The Madras decision was based upon two judgments of the Judicial Committee³ with reference to the construction of Act 129 of the 2nd Schedule of an earlier Limitation Act (IX. of 1871). That article provided a limitation for suits to "set aside an adoption," and was held to be equally applicable to suits seeking a mere declaration that the adoption was invalid, and to suits which sought the possession of property held under colour of an alleged adoption. Although the phraseology of that article differs from that of the article now in force, which in terms contemplates only a declaratory suit,⁴ there are observations of the Judicial Committee which were held to be equally applicable to the present law.⁵

This rule of limitation has no application to a case where the proceeding or document is on its face no obstacle to the title of the heir, as, for instance, where a woman adopts to herself and not to her husband.⁶

If the right of the nearest reversioner for the time being to contest an adoption by the widow is allowed to become barred by limitation as against him, this will not bar the similar rights of the subsequent reversioners.⁷

the person claiming under an alleged adoption had held the property for more than twelve years adversely to the widow of his adoptive father¹ or to the plaintiff.

Limitation of suit to declare adoption
valid.

A suit "to obtain a declaration that an adoption is valid" must be brought within "six years" from the time "when the rights of the adopted son as such² are interfered with."³

It has been held by the High Courts of Bengal⁴ and the North-west Provinces⁵ that this article does not prevent a suit for possession by a person claiming as an adopted son, even though it be brought more than six years after his rights have been interfered with.⁶

A different view has been accepted in Bombay.⁷ In Madras the High Court has differed on this question.⁸ The section clearly does not bar a suit in which the plaintiff claims to succeed independently of the alleged adoption.⁹

possession.

Where time has begun to run before the adoption as in the case of the widow being dispossessed, the adopted son may be barred by adverse possession,¹⁰ but in a suit claiming property alienated by the widow before the adoption, time does not begin to run before the adoption.¹¹

Election.

Where a person, entitled to dispute an adoption, is benefitted in the same character by a will, or other disposition of property, which benefits the person adopted, he must elect whether to take under the will, or other disposition, or against it.

"A principle not peculiar to English law, but common to all law, which is based on the rules of justice, namely . . . that a party shall not, at the same time, affirm and disaffirm the same transaction—affirm it as far as it is for his benefit, and disaffirm it as far as it is to his prejudice.”¹

A person, whose title depends upon an adoption, must, in a contest between him and the person who would succeed in the absence of such adoption, prove the fact of the adoption,² the performance of the ceremonies³ (if any) which may be necessary,⁴ and such facts as are necessary to establish its validity.⁵ If the adoption was by a widow, who could not adopt without permission, he must prove the fact of such permission having been given.⁶

The burden of proving the adoption is on the person alleging it, in the unusual case of the adoption being denied by the person alleged to be adopted.⁷

Where the plaintiff claims property as heir, and is unable to establish his relationship, it is unnecessary for the defendant to prove his adoption.¹

In certain summary proceedings a de facto adoption might be acted upon until set aside in a properly constituted suit.²

Where the fact of the adoption is admitted, and it is alleged that the natural father has lost his right to give in adoption, the burden of proving such loss is upon the person alleging it.³

There is authority that in a suit which merely seeks to declare invalid an adoption which in fact took place, the burden of proof is upon the person seeking to obtain such declaration.⁴

Estoppel.

A person entitled to dispute an adoption may be estopped from disputing it, although the same adoption may be liable to be disputed by other persons who are not so estopped.

Evidence Act, s. 115.

The Indian Evidence Act,⁵ s. 115, enacted as follows:—

“Where one person has, by his declaration, act, or omission, intentionally caused or permitted another person to believe a thing to be true, and to act upon such belief,⁶ neither he nor his representative⁷ shall be allowed, in any suit or proceeding between himself and such person or his representative, to deny the truth of that thing.”

For instance, a widow representing to the natural father that she had a power to adopt, and thereby inducing him to give his son in adoption, would be estopped from thereafter denying the power.⁸

Allowing the thread ceremony and marriage to be performed in the adoptive family, and otherwise allowing the youth to act as an adopted son, would amount to an estoppel.¹

Active participation in the adoption may also operate as an estoppel.²

A person may be so estopped, although he was acting in good faith, Good faith. or without a full knowledge of the circumstances, or was under a mistake or misapprehension.³

Mere acquiescence in, or presence at, an adoption is not sufficient to create an estoppel.⁴

The person taking in adoption would generally, in the absence of fraud or coercion, be estopped from denying the adoption,⁵ but where there has been no mis-statement,⁶ or conduct equivalent thereto, or where the mis-statement has not been acted upon,⁷ there can be no estoppel.

A person is not estopped from denying an adoption merely because he had previously secured succession to properties by setting up that adoption, when it appears that his claim as adopted son was not opposed by the person as against whom he is said to be estopped.⁸

The acts of a Hindu female, who "is acting without the guidance of a disinterested adviser, cannot prejudice her."⁹

The misrepresentation to operate as an estoppel must apparently be Matters of law. of a matter of fact. An erroneous expression of opinion that an adoption was valid in law could not apparently lead to an estoppel, nor could a person apparently be estopped from asserting the state of the law.¹⁰

In Parvatibayamma v. Ramakrishna Rau,¹ it was laid down on the authority of Gopalayyan v. Raghupatiayyan,² that "the claimant has to show that by a course of conduct long continued on the part of the family which has purported to affiliate him, his situation in his original family has been altered so that it would be impossible to restore him to it." This limitation to the doctrine of estoppel is not, it is submitted, justified by the terms of sec. 115 of the Evidence Act. There seems to have been no estoppel in that case, as the representation, if made, was neither believed nor acted upon.

Mode of proof. The fact of the adoption, and of the power (if any), and of the circumstances necessary to establish the validity of the adoption, must be proved in the same way as any other fact. There are no special rules of evidence applicable.

The Court must carefully and strictly examine the evidence as to the completion of the act of adoption, and as to the facts which are necessary to validate it.³

Acquiescence by the person entitled to dispute an adoption, or by other members of the family, is some evidence of the fact of the adoption. Its value as such must depend upon the circumstances. Where it has arisen from an imperfect knowledge of the facts it can be of no value.⁴

A statement as to the existence of the power by the person alleged to have given it is evidence in support of it.⁵

As to statements by a person who is dead, or who cannot be found, or who has become incapable of giving evidence, or whose attendance cannot be procured without an amount of delay or expense which, under the circumstances of the case, appears to the Court unreasonable, when these statements relate to the existence of relationship by adoption, see the Indian Evidence Act I. of 1872, sec. 32 (5), (6).

A statement amounting to an admission by the person alleged to have been adopted will be evidence against him requiring explanation.⁶

An ancient report of a panchayet as to the pedigree of a family has been held to establish an adoption which was not then disputed.¹

A tradition in a wajib-ul-arz has been acted upon by the Judicial Committee.²

"It may be desirable carefully to examine cases of possible fraud, yet . . . instruments which are proved by all the attesting witnesses, and against which there is no evidence on the other side, ought not to be set aside and treated as nothing, on a mere suspicion of perjury and forgery."³

After such a lapse of time as makes it impossible, or difficult, to obtain direct evidence of the adoption, or of the performance of the necessary ceremonies, or of the giving of the necessary permission, evidence of recognition by the adoptive parents, or by other members of the family, or of treatment as an adopted son by permitting him to perform the family worship, or to share in the inheritance, or otherwise, may be sufficient to establish an adoption, or, at any rate, to render slight evidence sufficient,⁴ and in any case will, it is submitted, be admissible in support of the adoption,⁵ but such evidence cannot establish an adoption which is in law invalid.

⁵ See Indian Evidence Act (I. of 1872), s. 50. In that section "it will be noted that the words 'by blood marriage and adoption' have not been inserted after the word 'relationship' by Act XVIII. of 1872, as in the case of s. 32, cls. (5) and (6). Illustration (a) refers to the case of marriage, but relationship is not mentioned," Amser Ali and Woodroffe's "Law of Evidence," 1st ed., p. 360. This would seem to show that the conduct of relations would not be admissible as evidence in the case of adoption, but the Indian Courts have undoubtedly been

A person who asks the Court to presume that an adoption did take place, must establish an initial probability that the adoption was likely to have been validly made and that the conduct of the partners cognizant of the facts had been at least consistent with such an hypothesis.¹

Probabilities. Where there is conflicting evidence upon the fact of an adoption, much must depend upon the probabilities of the case to be collected from the admitted or proved facts, but such probabilities do not take the place of evidence.

Aged adopter. The fact that the person alleged to have adopted was childless, and advanced in years, and had despaired of having male issue;² or the fact that he was anxious to deliver himself from Put,³ give rise to a probability that he wished to adopt.

Solicitude as to future state. The fact that the alleged adoptive father or mother was at enmity with the reversioner might also render an adoption probable.⁴

Enmity with heir. The fact that the alleged adoptive father or mother was at enmity with the reversioner might also render an adoption probable.⁴

Religious duty. The religious duty to adopt a son, which is said to be incumbent upon every childless Hindu,⁵ is also a circumstance to be taken into consideration,⁶ but by itself it has not much force, having regard "to the fact that childless Hindus die daily without having fulfilled this obligation, or made provision for its fulfilment after their death."⁷ in the habit of admitting such evidence. With two exceptions (Hur Dyal Nag v. Roy Krishto Bhoomick and Vyas Chimanlal v. Vyas Ramchandra), the decisions in note 4 above were given before the passing of the Indian Evidence Act.

Absence of notices and ceremonials. On the other hand, the absence of notices to relations and of ceremonials may be evidence against the probability of the fact of adoption.

In Sootroogun Sutputty v. Sabitra Dye,¹ the Judicial Committee say, "But although neither written acknowledgments, nor the performance of any religious ceremonials, are essential to the validity of adoptions, such acknowledgments are usually given, and such ceremonies observed, and notices given of the times when adoptions are to take place, in all families of distinction, as those of zemindars or opulent Brahmins, that wherever these have been omitted, it behoves the Court to regard with extreme suspicion the proof offered in support of an adoption. I would say, that in no case should the rights of wives and daughters be transferred to strangers, or more remote relations, unless the proof of adoption by which that transfer is effected be proved by evidence free from all suspicion of fraud, and so consistent and probable as to give no occasion for doubt of its truth."

The youth,² or vigour,³ of the alleged adopting father, and the consequent probability of male issue, may also be a circumstance rendering the adoption improbable.

"In considering the validity of" powers to adopt, "it is of great importance, in the first place to ascertain the position of the parties at the time when the instruments are alleged to have come into existence, and the motives which may have led to the execution of them."⁴

Position of parties, and motives.

A permission to give in adoption may be presumed,⁵ but no such presumption may be made with reference to a permission to take in adoption.⁶

Presumption as to permission.

It has been held⁷ that "when the Court is satisfied that the authority to adopt really was given, it will require comparatively slight proof of the performance of the ceremonies by which the adoption is completed. But

CHAPTER IV.

RESULTS OF DATTAKA ADOPTION.

ADOPTION in the Dattaka form completely transfers the boy from the family of his natural father to that of his adoptive father, and, except as specially provided by the law,¹ he acquires, as from the date of the adoption,² all the rights, privileges, duties, and obligations of a son born to his adoptive father.³

Adoption
operates as affiliation.

When he has been adopted by a widow, his rights do not date back to the death of his adoptive father.⁴

guardianship.

The right of guardianship of an adopted son passes by the adoption from the natural parents to the adoptive parents.³

survivorship.

A son adopted by a Hindu governed by the Mitakshara school of law acquires the same rights in ancestral property on adoption⁴ as would be possessed on birth by a natural son born to his adoptive father.⁵

Inheritance
ex parte
paterna.

Except where a son is born to his adoptive father subsequent to the adoption,⁶ an adopted son inherits to his adoptive father,⁷ and to the relations, whether lineal or collateral, of his adoptive father, to the same extent as he would have inherited if he had been born as a son to his adoptive father.⁸

The right of the adopted son and of his heirs to inherit to the following relations by adoption has been established:—

1. Paternal grandfather.¹
2. Paternal uncle.²
3. First cousin of his father.³
4. First cousin of his grandfather.⁴
5. Father's brother's son.⁵
6. Father's daughter's son.⁶
7. Father's third cousin.⁷
8. The adopted son of the son of the brother of the man to whom the father of the claimant was adopted.⁸

Where an adopted son ousts his adoptive father's widow, who has taken possession in ignorance of the adoption, he is entitled to receive such rents and profits which have been received, or might with due diligence have been received, between the death of his adoptive father and his getting possession, credit being given for the maintenance of the widow, funeral expenses, and all such expenditure as she might properly have made as widow, subject to any question as to limitation.⁹

Conversely the relations of the adoptive father will inherit to the adopted son in the same way as if he had been a son born to his adoptive father.

An hereditary title or honour passes to an adopted son, Title. and his descendants, in the same way as to a legitimate son, or his descendants.

Inheritance ex parte materna.

Where the adoption is by a husband alone,¹ or in association with his wife, or one of his wives, or where it has been made to him by his wife with his concurrence, or after his death, the son inherits to the wife,² and to her relations,³ in the same way as if he had been a son born to such wife.

The right of the adopted son to inherit to the brother,⁴ and father,⁵ of the adoptive mother has been upheld.

The adoptive mother⁶ and her relatives⁷ inherit to the adopted son in the same way as if she had been his natural mother.

Where an adoption is made by a husband in conjunction with one only of several wives, or after his death by one of several wives, the adopted son⁸ inherits only to that wife and her relations, his relationship to the other wives being that of a step-son.

It is unsettled whether, when a man adopts in conjunction with more than one wife,⁹ or where two or more widows adopt in accordance with a joint power,¹⁰ or where two or more widows adopt in Western India jointly,¹ the adopted son inherits to all the widows so adopting and their relatives. It is submitted that this question depends upon whether such joint adoption is authorized by the law.² The mere concurrence by a widow in an adoption by her co-widow would not, it is submitted, confer upon the adopted son any rights of inheritance to her or her relations.

It seems also to be unsettled whether, when a husband adopts in spite of his wife's express dissent, the son inherits to her and to her relations.³

A son adopted by a man who is disqualified from inheritance by reason of a personal disability, such as congenital blindness, impotence, or lameness,⁴ cannot acquire greater rights than his adoptive father, and therefore cannot inherit to any one from whom the adoptive father was disqualified from inheriting.⁵

Adopted son of disqualified man.

There is, it is submitted, nothing to prevent his inheritance from his adoptive father⁶ and from his adoptive mother and her relations. According to the "Dattaka Chandrika"⁷ he is entitled to maintenance.

The descendants of an adopted son have the same rights of inheritance as the descendants of a legitimately begotten son.⁸

adopted son,¹ whether the property held by him be partible or impartible.² He can, in giving a power of adoption, require as a condition of the exercise of the power that the estate of his widow should not be interfered with,³ and might apparently impose such other conditions as are not inconsistent with the provisions of the law of gifts and wills.⁴

Adoption does not revoke will.

In cases governed by the Hindu Wills Act, adoption, or the giving of a power of adoption, does not operate as a revocation of a will.⁵

There is some authority that in other cases a Hindu has no power to completely disinherit his adoptive son, and that a will making no provision for adopted sons would be invalidated by a power given subsequently,⁶ but it is submitted that there is no reason why an adoption should have greater effect than the birth of a son in revoking a will. Where the will purports to deal with property, over which the adopting father ceased to have a power of disposition on the birth or adoption of a son, it would be ineffectual to deal with the property⁷ except where assent to the provisions of the will was a condition of the adoption.⁸

disposition.

Effect would apparently be given to an arrangement made at the time of the adoption stipulating that the adoptive father should not exercise his powers of disposition. Such arrangement would be enforced at the instance of the adopted son.⁹

In cases governed by the Mitakshara law, the adoptive father has no power to interfere with the adopted son's right of survivorship in coparcenary property.¹

When, after attaining the age of majority, an adopted son ratifies an arrangement made between his natural father and the person adopting him limiting the interest in coparcenary property which he would acquire by adoption, he is bound by the arrangement.² It is unsettled whether, in the absence of such ratification, he can be bound by such arrangement, but it is submitted that if the arrangement be a fair one, and does not unduly interfere with the rights of the adopted son, effect will be given to it, at any rate when the arrangement is made with the adoptive father or is authorized by him.

The Madras High Court has upheld dispositions of ancestral property by the adopting father with the consent of the natural father for the purpose of providing for the maintenance of the wife of the adopting father.³

In another case⁴ the Bombay High Court held that when the adopted son and the person who gave him in adoption were fully cognizant of the disposition of the property made by the testator, and with the knowledge of such disposition the natural father consented to the adoption taking place, and when the disposition and the adoption might, under the circumstances, be regarded as one transaction, the disposition, though contained in a will, could not be repudiated by the adopted son. "The principle underlying the decision is that the disposition was one which it was competent to the testator to make prior to the adoption, and that its acceptance being presumably a condition subject to which the adoption was made, it made no difference that the disposition was testamentary.”¹

The same Court upheld an arrangement between the natural father and the adopting mother, where provision was made for the enjoyment of a portion of the property by the mother in the case of her disagreement with the adopted son.²

In Ramasawmi Aiyun v. Vencataramaiyan,³ the Judicial Committee said, “How far the natural father can by agreement before the adoption renounce all or part of his son’s rights, is a question not altogether unattended with difficulty; although the case of *Chitko Raghunath Rajadiksh v. Janaki*⁴ certainly decides that an agreement on the part of the father that his son’s interest shall be postponed to the life interest of the widow is valid and binding.” In *Bhaiya Rabidat Singh v. Indur Kunwar (Maharani)*⁵ the Judicial Committee said, “It is difficult to understand how a declaration by Guman Singh (the natural father) on an agreement by him, if it was an agreement, could prejudice or affect the rights of his son, which would only arise when his parental control and authority determined.”

It is submitted that the determination of this question depends upon the nature of the particular arrangement. It is scarcely necessary to speculate as to what would happen if the natural father assented to a disposition of the whole of the ancestral property away from the son, as such a case is not likely to occur. If such case did occur, the Courts would probably hold that the natural father acted in excess of his powers, and that his son was not bound by it, but in dealing with a less extreme case, effect might well be given to a fair arrangement, in which the son distinctly benefits by the adoption. Where the adoptive father is separate from his kinsmen, and has, therefore, a power of disposing by will even of ancestral property, if he has no son, it must be remembered that he is by any such arrangement only doing what it was competent for him to do in the absence of an adoption.

As to a condition contained in the permission to adopt, see ante, pp. 116, 117.

There is authority that where there is an express power of adoption given by the husband, the widow cannot originate conditions. If she does so, the adoption would be valid, and the conditions would be ineffectual.⁶

Effect would be given to an arrangement which had been ratified by the boy after attaining majority.¹

In Bombay it has been held that a widow can, at the time of the adoption, make a fair arrangement for the protection of her interest in the estate during her lifetime.² The cases in which this conclusion has been arrived at were not cases in which express power was given by the husband, but cases where the widow exercised the power given to her by the system of Hindu law prevalent in Western India.³

When a widow obtains a reservation of rights by such an arrangement, she possesses therein only the ordinary rights of a Hindu widow.⁴

A widow would apparently have no power to arrange with the natural father to obtain for herself an interest in property which had not been vested in her, as, for instance, in property which, on her husband's death, passed by survivorship to other members of the family, and which is devested by the adoption.⁵

Where, after an adoption,⁶ a son is born to the adoptive father, the adopted son loses all rights to the performance of religious ceremonies, and his rights of inheritance are reduced—

Sudras.

It is not settled whether this rule applies to Sudras, or whether in the case of Sudras natural-born and adopted sons take equally.

The Madras High Court has held³ that among Sudras the adopted son is entitled to take an equal share with a legitimate son, who is born subsequently to the adoption. The "Dattaka Chandrika"⁴ is to the same effect, and the same view is said to have been taken by the Calcutta High Court.⁵ Baboo Shamachurn Sircar holds that this does not apply to what he calls "the good Shudras of this country."⁶ This distinction is based upon a text of Vridhdha Goutama, which says, "A given son abounding in good qualities existing, should a legitimate son be born at any time: let both be equal sharers of the father's whole estate."⁷ It is submitted that where there is no special custom, the above rule applies to all classes of Sudras alike.⁸

it was held by the Madras Sudder Court that B inherited all the property of A.¹

It is not settled whether, in sharing an inheritance with a natural relation of the same degree other than a legitimate son, an adopted son is entitled to a less share than that of a legitimate son.

Competition between adopted son and relations
other than son.

It is submitted that, at any rate, on a partition of joint family property in a case governed by the Mitakshara law, there is no reason why he should receive a less share than he would have received if he had been a legitimate son.

It has been held in Tara Mohun Bhattacharjee v. Kripa Moyee Debis,² by a Bench of the Bengal High Court, that "when an adopted son comes to share with heirs other than the legitimately begotten sons of his adoptive father in the property of kinsmen, he takes the same share that they would have," and in Surjokant Nundi v. Mohesh Chunder Dutt,³ it was held by the same Court that the adopted son of one daughter shares equally with the natural son of another daughter in the inheritance left by his maternal grandfather, but it does not appear from the report whether this question was discussed in that case. In *Raghunund Das v. Sadhu Churn Das*⁴ it was held by the same Court in a case governed by the "Mitakshara" that in a partition between an adopted son and the natural-born sons of the brothers of his adoptive father the adopted son can only take half the share which he would have taken if he had been a legitimate son. This decision was based upon a paragraph⁵ of the "Dattaka Chandrika,"⁶ which has no reference

⁵ 24. "Therefore by the same relationship of brother and so forth, in virtue of which the real legitimate son would succeed to the estate of a brother or other kinsman, the adopted son of the same description obtains his due share. And in the event of the ancestor having other sons, a grandson by adoption whose father is dead obtains the share of an adopted son. Where such son may not exist, the adopted son takes the whole estate even." The words in italics are omitted in Mr. Sutherland's translation. See Raghunund Doss v. Sadhu Churn Doss (1878), 4 Calc. 425, at pp. 428, 429; 3 C. L. R. 534, at p. 538.

⁶ The "Dattaka Chandrika" is an to the peculiar incidents of a Mitakshara joint family.¹ It has been doubted by the High Court of Madras.² Mr. Mayne³ also gives reasons for doubting its authority. Sastri G. C. Sircar⁴ says, "There cannot be any doubt that according to the 'Dattaka Chandrika,' when a relation by adoption is entitled to inherit together with a real relation of the same degree, either lineally or collaterally, the former must take half as much as is taken by the latter; as, in fact, the rule which has been laid down with respect to the distribution of the adopter's estate between an adopted and a real son, is to be applied to all cases. Accordingly it was held, upon the opinion of a Pundit in a case in which succession opened to the nephews, that a nephew by adoption was entitled to half of what was to be allotted to each of the real nephews."⁵ He, however, points out the error of the Calcutta High Court in applying this rule in the case of Raghubanund Das v. Sadhu Churn Das,⁶ as in that case the adopted son was entitled to the whole share which his father would have been entitled to, if a partition had been effected in his lifetime.⁷

The birth of a legitimate son would not apparently affect the incapacity of the adopted son to marry in, or adopt from, his adoptive family.

Jains.

The Jain law in this matter coincides with the ordinary Hindu law.⁸

Impartible property.

In the case of impartible property the afterborn son succeeds to the exclusion of the adopted son.⁹

Renunciation or waiver of rights.

An adopted son can renounce his interest in property which becomes vested in him by virtue of his adoption, or may waive any of his rights therein.¹⁰

On such renunciation the person who would take in default of adoption would succeed to the property.¹¹

There is nothing to prevent an adopted son from making over his rights in the property, or in a portion thereof, to his adoptive mother or to any one else after he has attained majority.¹

Except when he has been adopted as a dvyamushyayana,² an adopted son loses by his adoption all rights as the son of his natural father and mother.³

Exclusion from rights in natural family.

He cannot inherit to the members of his natural family,⁴ except he has such right as the son of his adoptive father, and they cannot inherit to him.⁵

It may happen that he loses the right to succeed to his natural mother and her relatives, and does not acquire a new mother, or maternal relatives for spiritual or temporal purposes, as where the adoption is by a bachelor, or a widower,⁶ or by the adoptive father alone.⁷

An adopted son on adoption ceases to be liable for the debts⁸ or other obligations for which he would have been liable as a member of his natural family.

In parts of the Punjab the rights of the adopted son in his natural Punjab family take effect if his natural father dies without leaving legitimate sons.⁹

In the case of an adoption made by the Gyawals (a class of priests Gyawals. at Gya in Behar), the person adopted does not lose his rights in his natural family.¹⁰

Adoption does not divest any property which has vested in the adopted son by inheritance, gift, or any form of self-acquisition previous to the adoption.¹¹

Dhyamushyayana.

A boy can be adopted, so as to retain his relationship to his natural father, while acquiring the relationship of a son to his adoptive father. He is then said to be Dhyamushyayana,³ or son of two fathers.

When so adopted he is either—

(a) Nitya Dhyamushyayana (i.e. perpetual or absolute son of two fathers); or

(b) Anitya Dhyamushyayana (i.e. temporary son of two fathers).

A boy adopted in Mithila by the Kritima form of adoption is also treated as the son of two fathers.⁴

Nitya dhyamushyayana.

Where there is an understanding, or a previous stipulation between the giver and the receiver in adoption, that the boy should belong to both of them, the boy is said to be nitya dhyamushyayana.⁵

This arrangement can be made by a widow taking in adoption.¹

The authorities show that where an only son has been adopted by a united brother of his father it is presumed that there was an arrangement that he was to be dhyamushyayana.² It does not seem to be very clear whether this rule applies only to the adoption of an only son of a brother, or whether it is applicable to all only sons.³ It applies to adoption by widows of brothers.⁴

As it has now been held that an only son can be adopted in the Dattaka form,⁵ there seems to be little advantage in adopting a boy as a dhyamushyayana, for a boy so adopted could not secure the salvation of the person adopting as effectually as a Dattaka son.⁶ The adoption of a boy as dhyamushyayana under these circumstances seems to have arisen from a desire to reconcile the prohibition against the adoption of an only son with the recommendation to adopt the son of a brother. There is no necessity to evade a prohibition which has now been held to have no legal force.

Sircar ("Law of Adoption," p. 377), says, "It may no doubt be contended from what Nanda Pandita says in one passage that the gift of an only son is limited to the case of brothers. But in the very next passage ('Dattaka Mimansa,' ii. 39)

he explains the principle of the adoption of an only son, which is applicable to all cases. And this general position is supported by what is said in the 'Mitakshara' with respect to the analogous case of a son produced by a man other than the brother on another man's wife. The 'Dattaka Chandrika,' however, does not appear to limit the dhyamushyayana adoption of an only son to the case of adoption by a paternal uncle only, but intimates it to be applicable to all cases" ("Dattaka Chandrika," ii. 28; iii. 17; v. 33). In some parts of India a nitya dvyamushyayana seems to be quite obsolete.¹

It is obsolete on the east coast, but is said to be the ordinary form of adoption recognized in Malabar and amongst the Nambudri Brahmins.² The practice has been held by the Bombay High Court to exist among Lingayets, whether the brothers are divided or joint.³

It is said to be not at all unusual in the southern districts of the Bombay Presidency,⁴ and it has been recognized by the Judicial Committee in two cases from Bengal,⁵ and by the Allahabad High Court in a case from Bareilly.⁶

Anitya dvyamushyayana.

When from a different gotra (family) a boy is adopted after he has been initiated into the ceremony of tonsure in the gotra of his natural father, and is invested with the sacred thread in the gotra of his adoptive father, as the rites of initiation have been performed by both fathers, he is said to be termed anitya dvyamushyayana.⁷

The anitya dvyamushyayana is said to be unknown to modern Hindu law.⁸

The forms and conditions of dvyamushyayana adoption are the same as in other cases, where the adoption is in the Dattaka form.⁹

Inheritance in case of dvyamushyayana.

In both kinds of dvyamushyayana the boy adopted inherits both in the family in which he was born and in the family of his adopter.¹⁰

The authorities seem to show that the issue of the anitya dvyamushyayana revert to their father's natural family.¹¹ As in the other inheritance can be divested by the adoption of a son by a widow after her husband's death."

Although the judgment proceeded on the circumstance that the person in whom the estate was vested had assented to the adoption, it is said in Babu Anaji v. Ratnoji Krishnarav,¹ "For the purposes of inheritance the adoption may be considered as relating back to the death of the adoptive father divesting all estates which have during the intermediate period become vested, as it were, conditionally in another." This is, it is submitted, put too broadly. In the same case² the Court, in referring to Sri Raghunada v. Sri Brozo Kishoro,³ says that "the person whose estate was there divested was a male full owner," but in the case cited the parties were members of a joint undivided family, governed by the Mitakshara law, and the person whose estate was divested had not obtained it by inheritance, but by survivorship.⁴

In Surendra Nandan Das v. Sailaja Kant Das,⁵ expressions are used which would seem to apply to an estate of inheritance, but the Court was there dealing with a case where there had been a succession by survivorship in a family governed by the Mitakshara school of law.

So far as the estate of the donor of a power of adoption is concerned, the only persons whose rights of inheritance are superior to those of his widow are his son, grandson, and great-grandson, during the lifetime of any one of whom no adoption can take place, and an heir of one of such persons, in whom the estate has been vested after his death. When the estate has vested in such heir the power is at an end,⁶ and no estate is divested by an attempted exercise of the power.⁷

Where the power is at an end,⁸ or from any other reason the adoption is invalid, the adoption does not even divest the interest of the woman who purports to adopt.⁹

The divesting of an estate taken as devisee under a will may perhaps stand upon a different footing.¹⁰

Where there is a provision in a will that the estate of the devisee should be divested on an adoption, and that the adopted son should take the property, such provision might be effectual.¹

It is submitted that an estate cannot be divested by the mere consent of the person in whom it is vested. Consent to divesting.

This seems to be in accordance with the weight of authority.² It is submitted that this question depends upon the question whether consent can validate an adoption, which is otherwise invalid.³ If it has not such effect, then the divesting of an estate would, it seems, not be effected by the act of adoption, but only in the way provided by law for the transfer of property.⁴

Even if consent can operate to divest an estate a distinction might well be made between the cases in which the person so consenting is a full owner, and those in which the estate is vested in a qualified owner; in which latter cases the rights of the reversioners could scarcely be prejudiced by the consent.⁵

Even if the then immediate reversioners should also consent, it is by no means clear that the rights of the persons who should become entitled on the succession opening out would be affected.⁶

Where the consent is necessary for the purpose of validating the adoption, as in Madras,⁷ or Bombay,⁸ effect would be given to it. This question stands on a different footing.

The rule prohibiting the divesting of estates applies Impartible to impartible estates not governed by the Mitakshara law.

Fraud.

The rule is not affected by the circumstance that the adoption has been delayed by fraud, even when the fraud has been practised by a person who has thereby procured the vesting of the estate in him.¹

Maintenance of widow.

A widow whose estate is divested is entitled to maintenance from the property.²

Persons taking after widow.

An adoption prevents the succession of persons who would otherwise take the estate after the widow whose estate is divested.³

Devesting of rights acquired by survivorship.

By adoption to a deceased member of a joint family governed by the Mitakshara law a person acquires such interest in the joint family property as he would have acquired if he had been natural born, and his adoption divests such interest as has passed over to other members of the family by survivorship.⁴

Adoption would not, however, divest estates which had passed by inheritance from those who had acquired rights by survivorship.⁵

Impartible estate.

In the case of an impartible estate, the succession to which is in a joint family governed by Mitakshara law, the estate of a person to whom a right has accrued by survivorship may be divested by an adoption to the holder whose rights have so survived.⁶

An adopted son is not bound by unauthorized alienations made, or acts of waste committed by, the widow adopting him, at the time when the property was vested in her, or after the adoption,¹ or by the manager of the estate.

Thus an alienation made by the widow, even before the adoption, can be set aside at the instance of the adopted son, unless it be made under such circumstances as would bind the reversioners;² but even in the case where the transaction be not such as would have bound the reversioners, the alienee is entitled to retain possession during the lifetime or widowhood of the widow,³ as in the absence of an adoption she was competent to deal with her own personal interest,⁴ and the rights of the adopted son do not date before the adoption.⁵

Where the alienation was made in fraud and in contemplation of the adoption, the position might be different.⁶

It has been held that if the acts of the widow have been assented to by the then immediate reversioners, they cannot be questioned by the son who has been subsequently adopted,⁷ but it is submitted that this question depends upon whether a widow can with the concurrence of the then immediate reversioners give a complete title by transfer, a question which is not yet completely settled.¹

It is submitted that the same right to question the acts of the adoptive mother applies where she has succeeded to the estate as mother of a previously adopted son or of a natural born son. In Gobindo Nath Roy v. Ram Kanay Chowdhry,² it was held that the adopted son could not question an alienation made by the widow when she held the estate as mother, and that case was cited with approval in Kally Prosonno Ghose v. Gocool Chunder Mitter,³ and in Lakshman Bhau Khopkar v. Radhabai,⁴ but in neither of such two cases did this particular question arise. Mr. Mayne⁵ says, as to the first-named decision, "The decision was given without any inquiry as to the propriety of the alienation, and was rested on the authority of Chundrabullee's case.⁶ It does not seem to have occurred to the Court that a mother had no more than a limited estate, which, upon the authority of the case cited, was devested by the adoption. The son then came in for all rights which had not been lawfully disposed of, or barred, during the continuance of that estate."

It is doubtful whether a widow can, when adopting, stipulate that her management of the property shall not be inquired into. Apparently she would have no such power.⁷

The adopted son is bound by all acts of the widow within her authority.

A decree against a Hindu widow as representing her husband's estate binds her minor adopted son, and after the adoption the appeal, being for his benefit, must be considered as prosecuted on his behalf, even though he is not made a party thereto.⁸

An adopted son is not entitled to any account of the rents or profits of the estate rightfully received before his adoption by the widow or other person whose estate is divested by his adoption.¹

In the case of a joint family governed by the Mitakshara law, an adopted son is bound by an alienation made by his adoptive father, or by any other manager of the family, to the same extent as a natural son is bound.²

Alienation by father under Mitakshara law. ✓

He cannot dispute an alienation made by the adoptive father before his adoption,³ or any alienation of the separate property of such father.

In cases governed by the Bengal school of law, an adopted son cannot dispute alienations of property, whether ancestral or self-acquired, made by his adoptive father.⁴

Bengal school.

Where the adoption divests the estate of a male holder,⁵ the adopted son cannot question his alienations to the extent of ousting a bonâ fide holder for value, nor can he require an account of rents and profits.⁶

Alienations by male owner.

He might, perhaps, where the proceeds of the alienation had been earmarked, or not spent, require the alienor to account for such proceeds.

Adoption does not sever the tie of blood which exists between the adopted son and the members of his natural family. He cannot, therefore, marry in his natural family within the prohibited degrees,⁷ nor can he take in adoption therefrom a boy whom he could not have adopted if he had himself remained in that family.⁸

rights in that family,¹ rights of inheritance to the person (man or woman) actually adopting him,² and to no one else.³

His sons acquire no right of inheritance to his adoptive father.⁴

If a husband and wife jointly adopt he inherits to both. If the husband adopts one son and the wife another, the sons inherit and offer oblations to each respectively.⁵

This kind of adoption is purely contractual. There is no fiction of a new birth into the adoptive family. The son adopted "does not lose his claim to his own family, nor assume the surname of his adoptive father; he merely performs obsequies and takes the inheritance."⁶

He may perform the obsequies of his natural father or mother,⁷ and also those of his adopters. He would apparently be in the same position as to rights of survivorship in ancestral property in his adoptive family as a natural-born son would be.⁸

EFFECTS OF INVALID ADOPTION.

adoption.

Where there has been an adoption in form, but such adoption is for any reason invalid, the adopted son does not acquire any rights, as such, in the family of the person purporting to adopt him, except so far as he may be entitled to maintenance.

It is unsettled whether, on the adoption being set aside, the boy can revert to his natural family, and whether he has any right of maintenance in his adoptive family.

In Bengal, if not throughout India, it would seem that a member of one of the regenerate classes who had been invested with the sacred thread in his new family, or a Sudra who has undergone the ceremony of marriage in his new family, cannot revert to his natural family, but he would apparently be entitled so to revert before the happening of those events, and would acquire no rights of maintenance in the new family,⁷ at any rate if there had not been a valid giving and receiving.⁸ Where the above-mentioned ceremonies have been performed, or where there is a valid giving and receiving, but the adoption is invalid on account of some personal defect such as the fact that the boy belonged to a different class from that of his adoptive father, there is authority that he would acquire a right of maintenance.⁹

As to this case, G. C. Sircar says ("Law of Adoption," p. 424), "We have already seen that the performance of the initiatory ceremonies upon a person in the name of a gotra is considered to have the effect of irrevocably fixing his position in that gotra, hence a person upon whom these ceremonies have been performed in the name of the adoptive family cannot return to his own, notwithstanding the adoption may be invalid (Ruce Bhadr v. Roopshanker (1823), 2 Borrodaile, 656). It is difficult to see why that rule would not govern the case of an adoption that was made by an unauthorized widow; for the ceremonies in such a case also must be performed in the name of her husband's gotra."

It has been held in Madras that where the adoption was invalid on the ground of want of authority to take, there is no right of maintenance,¹ and that decision has been followed in Bombay.²

The difficulty in determining the rights of a person whose adoption is invalid arises from the absence of direct authority on the question as to when (if at all) he can revert to his natural family.

Where he can so revert, and loses nothing by the infructuous adoption, no hardship occurs. On the other hand, where he cannot so revert, as when he has been fixed by religious ceremonies in the family of the adopter,³ or, perhaps, wherever there has been an actual giving and receiving by persons competent to give and receive,⁴ it is right that he should, if possible, receive some compensation for the loss of inheritance in both families. His maintenance is the proper measure of compensation.

But where there is a gift of a boy to a person incompetent to receive, or by a person incompetent to give, the difficulty is the greater. If blame for the invalidity of the adoption can be attached to the adoptive father, as where he has omitted to satisfy himself as to the competency of the donor, or where he has given a power, which is in law invalid, it seems right that his estate should bear the burden of the maintenance. If the reversioner has delayed in challenging the adoption, it may also be equitable to require the estate to bear the burden of maintenance. Where there has been no such delay, and no blame can be attached to the adoptive father, it seems hard upon the reversioner that his interest should be affected by a charge which owes its origin to an unauthorized act. It is impossible to lay down any exact rule for adjusting these equities. The right might properly depend upon the circumstances of each case.

Descendants.

A right of maintenance would apparently not extend to the descendants of the person invalidly adopted.⁵ The only texts which provide for the maintenance of persons invalidly adopted, except with regard to those belonging to a class different from that of the adoptive father,⁶ only contemplate the expenses of the marriage being provided.⁷

Arrangement.

In some cases a boy whose adoption is invalid can take advantage of an arrangement made at the time of his adoption, or thereafter.

The invalidity of an adoption would not invalidate a gift by will or otherwise to a person erroneously described as an adopted son,³ unless it appear that the validity of the adoption was a condition of,⁴ or the motive for,⁵ the gift.

Gift to person erroneously described as adopted.

A gift or bequest to a described person with a direction that he should be adopted as a son to the donor or testator takes effect, even in the absence of such adoption,⁶ unless it appears that the adoption was a condition of the gift.⁷ If it be reasonably clear that the testator would not have made the gift had it not been for the supposed existence

CHAPTER V.

DUTIES AND RIGHTS OF FATHER.

Maintenance.

IT is the duty of a Hindu father to maintain his minor sons¹ and unmarried daughters, provided they are not interested in property sufficient for their support, or are not otherwise capable of maintaining themselves.²

Maintenance of children.

It is his duty to provide the marriage expenses of his daughters, and to cause his son to be educated in accordance with his station in life.

There is no obligation to maintain an adult son,³ except, perhaps, when he is suffering from a disease which prevents him from maintaining himself.⁴

With the exception of a case in Bengal, where it was held that a suit would lie by the mother of an illegitimate child against the putative father of the maintenance of the child,⁵ and of a case in Madras where a decree was given at the instance of an illegitimate son,¹ the Reports do not show any successful cases of proceedings in Civil Courts against a father for the maintenance of his child. It seems doubtful whether the duty can be enforced in a Civil Court,² but it is submitted that if an illegitimate son can enforce such right, legitimate sons are equally entitled.

It is clear that even if there be a right to maintenance, separate maintenance can only be awarded under very special circumstances.³

On the death of the father the maintenance of unmarried daughters, and the expenses of their marriage, must be provided out of his property.⁴

As to how far it amounts to a charge upon the property, see ante, pp. 88-92.

Married daughter.

Although on her marriage a daughter ceases to belong to her father's family,⁵ and must first look to her husband⁶ and his family⁷ for her maintenance, there is a moral duty to maintain a married daughter who is without means, and who is unable to obtain support from her husband, or after his death from his family. This duty is not enforceable during the father's lifetime, and it has been held that it is not enforceable against his property after his death.⁸

Persons
inheritance.

Where a son or other heir is excluded from inheritance on account of disability, he is entitled to maintenance for himself and his family out of the property which he would have inherited.⁹

A father may be compelled, by proceedings under the Criminal Procedure Code,¹ to maintain his legitimate or illegitimate child, of whatever age he or she may be, who is unable to maintain himself or herself.

Proceedings in Criminal Court.

As to the rights of children to maintenance out of coparcenary property, see post, pp. 242, 272.

A Hindu is bound to provide for the maintenance of his minor² illegitimate sons³ by Hindu mothers.⁴

sons.

After his death his illegitimate sons are entitled to maintenance out of his estate, or out of property in which he was a coparcener,⁵ whether impartible or not,⁶ if he was a member of one of the regenerate classes.⁷ If he was a Sudra they are only so entitled in case they are not entitled to inherit,⁸ or to a share on partition.

Under the Bengal school of law, this right against the father ceases on the sons attaining majority,⁹ but it is submitted that after the father's death there is a right against his property, even if they are adults.¹⁰ Under the Mitakshara school, they continue entitled to maintenance out of coparcenary property,¹ whether impartible or not; also out of self-acquired property which was owned by the father; but the right does not descend to their children.²

Obedience a condition.

It has been said by the Allahabad High Court in a case³ governed by the Mitakshara school of law, "Obedience to the head of the family, not the age of the illegitimate descendant, or his capacity to earn his own livelihood, is the test by which, under Hindu law, the continuance of the right to receive maintenance must be decided. Till the illegitimate sons reach full age, this test cannot be applied, but thereafter it cannot be ignored. What constitutes docility or disobedience, in the sense of the texts, is a question the answer of which is not easy; but we think that the true answer is indicated in a Vaivastha, translated as No. 2, Book I. chapter vi. section 2, of Messrs. West and Bühler's collection (ed. 1878, p. 276), and we think that, on attaining full age, the respondents must, as a condition of receiving maintenance from the estate of Mauji Lal (the father), render to the head of the family such reasonable service as is ordinarily rendered by cadets of a family in that station of life to which the parties belong."

"The Court would presume the natural son qualified to receive maintenance, unless the opposite party could show what, in the contemplation of the law, is a legal disqualification."⁴

The right of maintenance is not affected by the child being the result of a casual connection,⁵ or by the connection between the parents being adulterous.⁶

The maintenance of an illegitimate son may, like the maintenance of other persons entitled thereto,⁷ be secured on the property out of which he is entitled to be maintained.⁸

In a Madras case¹ it was said, "In determining the rate of maintenance, an illegitimate member of a family, who is not entitled to inherit, can be allowed only a compassionate rate of maintenance, and he cannot claim maintenance on the same principles and on the same scale as disqualified heirs and females who have become members of the family by marriage. In fixing, however, the compassionate rate of maintenance for the plaintiff, regard, no doubt, should be had to the interest of his deceased father in the joint family property and the position of his mother's family."

The right of an illegitimate daughter to maintenance under the Hindu law has been denied.²

A Hindu is morally, although not legally, bound to maintain the widow of his son, even "if he has no fund with the disposal of which his son, if alive, could interfere, and if he has inherited nothing from his son, and has not had his rights in any property enlarged by his son's death."³

The fact that the father-in-law had sold coparcenary property to pay his debts does not render him liable for his daughter-in-law's maintenance.⁴

After his death, the persons who inherit his property, or whose interest in property is enlarged by his death, are legally bound to maintain his daughter-in-law, if chaste,⁵ out of the property which they have so inherited, or in which their interest has been enlarged, whether the property be coparcenary or self-acquired.¹

This right does not interfere with the father-in-law's power to dispose of his self-acquired property by will.²

The daughter-in-law does not lose her right by declining to reside in her father-in-law's house.³

property.

Where the property of the father is impartible, and subject to the law of primogeniture, sons, even if adult, and capable of earning subsistence, are entitled to maintenance where the Mitakshara school of law applies.⁴ They are also so entitled after his death, as against their brother or the person in possession,⁵ whether, it is submitted, they are governed by the Bengal or the Mitakshara school. Their descendants have no such right.⁶

Grandchildren. Grandsons⁷ and granddaughters have not, as such, any right to be maintained by their grandfather.

The marriage expenses of a granddaughter have been held to be properly payable out of deceased grandfather's estate.¹

A Hindu is bound to support his father and mother if they are in want. After his death his property is liable for their maintenance.² Maintenance of parents.

A stepson is not obliged to maintain his stepmother out of his self-acquired property,³ but he must maintain her out of family property.

A grandmother and sister (until marriage, and after marriage if destitute⁴) are also to be maintained out of the property of a Hindu after his death.⁵

A mother does not apparently lose her right to maintenance by unchastity,⁶ except in Bengal.⁷

It is also the right and duty of a son to perform the funeral ceremonies and other ceremonies in commemoration of his father and mother.⁸

An heir is legally bound to provide out of the estate which descends to him maintenance for such persons as the ancestor was legally or morally bound to support.⁹ Duty of heir.

"The obligation of an heir to provide out of the estate, which descends to him, maintenance for certain persons whom the ancestor was legally or morally bound to maintain, is a legal as well as a moral obligation, for the estate is inherited subject to the obligation of providing such maintenance."¹⁰

There is a difficulty in determining whether the person claiming maintenance is one whom the late proprietor was morally bound to maintain.¹ The texts lay down generally that he who inherits a person's property is bound to maintain those whom that person was himself bound to maintain, including the persons disqualified from inheritance and those dependent on them.²

As to when maintenance is a complete charge upon property, see the cases relating to the maintenance of a widow, ante, pp. 88-92.

Guardianship.

Right of
guardianship.

A Hindu father is recognized as the legal guardian of all his male, and of his female unmarried, minor legitimate children,³ and is as such entitled to the custody of their persons and property.

The adoptive father acquires the same right, even as against the natural father.⁴

guardian.

An adult⁵ Hindu father can, by word or writing, nominate a guardian for his children, and he is unrestricted in the choice of such guardian. He may exclude even the mother from the guardianship.⁶

Although the right of the father to the guardianship of his children has been recognized by the legislature, it is one which is given to him for the benefit of his children, and should he at any time show himself unfit to be guardian the Court will place the custody of his children in a more suitable person.¹

Ample provision is made in the Guardians and Wards Act, 1890, for the purpose of protecting the persons and property of infants, and although the Court will have regard to the principle that it is generally for the benefit of infants that they should remain in the custody of their parents, and will also have regard to the personal law of the infant in question, the Courts will, in appointing a guardian, consider only the interest of the infant.²

On the death of the father, or in his absence,³ or in case of his having lost the right of guardianship, and in the absence of a valid appointment by him, the mother is entitled to the guardianship of her minor children.⁴

Right of mother.

It has been held that under the Mithila law, the mother is entitled to the guardianship even during the lifetime of the father.⁵

A mother would ordinarily be entitled to the guardianship of her illegitimate child, and the father would against the mother have no right of guardianship.⁶

Illegitimate children.

A parent is liable to be superseded by the appointment of a guardian under the provisions of the Guardians and Court.

Wards Act, 1890, but the Court cannot make such appointment when the father is alive, unless he is unfit to be guardian.¹

relations.

Failing the father and mother, the Hindu law prescribed a succession to the right of guardianship. The elder brother, the elder half-brother, the paternal relations, and failing them the maternal kinsmen were preferred in order of priority;² but their right was not, as in the case of the father or mother, an absolute one.³ In appointing a guardian a Court may be guided to some extent by this order of succession,⁴ but it would not give the same effect to the claims of these relatives as it would to the claim of a father or mother.

As to the guardianship of a female minor after marriage, see ante, pp. 62, 63.

Guardianship
of property.

If the minor is a member of a joint Hindu family, the kurta of the family would be entitled to the management of the joint property; but if the family be a divided one, the mother is, failing the father, entitled to the custody of the minor's property;⁵ and even if the family were joint, she would apparently be so entitled, so far as the minor's separate property, if any, is concerned. Where the mother is manager of her minor child's property, her position necessarily requires her to seek the advice of her husband's relations,⁶ and she would often strengthen her position by her so doing, but the law cannot compel her to seek, or to act under, their advice, if she wishes to take the whole responsibility upon herself.

Loss of right.

A father may lose his right to the guardianship of his children by a persistent course of ill-treatment, by conduct tending to their corruption, or by acting in a way injurious to their morals or interest.⁷ He may lose the right by

CHAPTER VI.

THE JOINT FAMILY AND ITS PROPERTY.

Of what the family consists.

AMONG Hindus a family is not ordinarily composed only of parents and their unmarried children, although that type of family is sometimes to be found. The family would generally be composed of a man, his wife, his unmarried children, his married sons and their wives and children, and, in cases where they are not maintained by their husband's family, his widowed daughters.¹

A family of this type, although in many respects complete in itself, might be a component part of a larger family. This larger family consists of all the descendants in the male line from a common ancestor, and their wives, sons, and unmarried daughters.²

Whether the family be of the larger or smaller type, the members would ordinarily live together, being maintained from the common purse, and performing jointly the ceremonies required by their religion.

A family so living together is called by English lawyers a joint Hindu family, and in its ordinary condition the members of it are said to be joint in food, worship, and estate.

Rights of members.

The rights of the individual members in the property belonging to the family varies, in accordance with the school of law to which the family belongs.³

If the family be governed by the Bengal school of law, sons have no rights in the joint property during the lifetime of their father. On his death intestate they acquire rights by inheritance.

The case of a family governed by the Mitakshara school of law is different. Within certain limits sons acquire by birth rights in the property, and can assert such rights even against their own father.

According to the Mitakshara school of law, "The conception of a Hindu family is a common male ancestor with his lineal descendants in the male line, and so long as that family is in its normal condition, viz. the undivided state, it forms a corporate body,"¹ or unit,² in the sense of having a continuous existence notwithstanding the death of individual members.³

Joint family according to the Mitakshara.

"Such corporate body, with its heritage, is purely a creation of law and cannot be created by act of parties, save in so far that by adoption a stranger may be affiliated as a member of that corporate family.

"According to the above conception of a family there may, of course, be one or more families all with one common ancestor, and each of the branches of that family with a separate common ancestor."⁴

"So long as a family remains an undivided unit, two or more members thereof—whether they be members of different branches or of one and the same branch of the family—can have no legal existence as a separate independent unit; but if they comprise all the members of a branch, or of a sub-branch, they can form a distinct and separate corporate unit within the larger corporate unit and hold property as such. Such property may be the 'self-acquisition' or 'obstructed heritage'⁵ of a paternal ancestor of that branch as distinguished from the other branches, which property has come to that branch and to that branch alone as 'unobstructed heritage,' or it may be the self-acquisition of one or more individual members of that branch, which by act of parties has been impressed with the character of joint property,⁶ owned by that branch and that branch alone, to the exclusion of the other branches."⁷

of family.

The joint family may be broken up by the separation of individual members from the corporate body, or by the partition of the rights of all the members. On such separation or partition, the separating or dividing members form new families, to which the joint family system applies.¹

The joint family may also come to an end by the death of the last surviving coparcener, in which case, in default of his disposing of the property, his heir takes by inheritance.

"By the nature of the case the joint family must commence, and also must end, when it does end, in an individual who holds the property in a separate condition. If this individual dies without becoming the root of a joint family, the Mitakshara law gives an interim enjoyment of the property to his female representatives, when there are any, and then transfers it to a collateral heir as the origin of a new joint family."²

As to the origin of the joint family system, and as to the similarities between it, and other ancient systems of law, see Sir Henry Maine's "Ancient Law," pp. 123-161; Mayne's "Hindu Law," 7th ed., chap. vii.; Krishna Kamal Bhattacharya's "Law Relating to the Joint Hindu Family," Lectures I. and II.; Jogendranath Bhattacharya's "Commentaries on the Hindu Law," 2nd ed., pp. 216-218.

Burden of proof as to family or property being joint.

In a suit which involves a question as to whether a family was joint or separate, or whether a particular property belonged to a joint family, or was the separate acquisition of an individual member of the family, the burden of proof would depend upon the allegations in the pleadings or at the hearing,³ and would, as in other cases, lie on the person who would fail if no evidence at all were given on either side.

This burden of proof would be shifted by the following presumptions :—

Every Hindu family is presumed to be joint in food, worship, and estate. The property belonging to that family is presumed to be joint and undivided, the burden of proving a separation being upon the person alleging it.¹

of union.

As to the presumption with regard to property in the name of a coparcener, see post, pp. 264, 265.

This presumption is merely as to the continuance of a juridical relationship.² It takes the place of evidence, and may be displaced by evidence of a state of things inconsistent with such presumption.³

It is not necessary, for the preservation of the joint nature of family property, that the members of the family should live in commensality; they may dwell and mess apart, and yet remain joint in property.⁴

dwelling and food.

The presumption that the family is joint would be weakened, if not rebutted, by evidence of separate trading, funds, and property, and independent dealing with such property,¹ although the family may have been joint in food.²

in severalty.

The circumstance that certain parcels are held in severalty does not rebut the presumption as regards the rest of the joint estate.³

unity.

Where it is admitted or proved that a disruption of the unity of the joint family has taken place, this presumption has no application.⁴

When one coparcener separates from the others there is no presumption that the remaining members continue united. In that case an agreement to remain united or to reunite must be proved like any other fact;⁵ but where a share is allotted to more than one person the presumption will be that such persons remain joint.⁶

No presumption
of separation.

When it is admitted or proved that the members of the family were not in a complete state of union at the time of the institution of the suit, there is no presumption as to the family being joint at a particular time,⁷ or as to when the separation took place, but it lies upon the plaintiff to prove such a case as would entitle him to the relief which he seeks.⁸

There is authority under the Bengal school of law that when one coparcener separates from the others who remain joint, such others are to be treated as reunited,⁹ but it is submitted that such separation in no way affects the status inter se of the coparceners who remain joint.¹

The presumption as to union applies to new families New families. formed from the separation of members of an old family.²

"The strength of the presumption necessarily varies in Strength of presumption. every case. The presumption of union is stronger in the case of brothers than in the case of cousins, and the farther you go from the founder of the family, the presumption becomes weaker and weaker."³

In practice a family does not continue joint for many generations. It has been said⁴ that "in no case . . . will it be found that the diluted degree of blood relationship amongst the members of the complex family group extends beyond the fourth degree." Another writer says, "I doubt whether at this day there is a single undivided Hindu family throughout India, in which persons related to one another by a common ancestor beyond the seventh degree are to be found living together, or holding property in common."⁵ The seventh degree seems always to have been the limit.⁶

The property belonging to a joint family is called the Coparcenary property. coparcenary property.

The expression used in the Mitakshara is translated as "ancestral property,"⁷ i.e. property transmitted in the direct male line from a common ancestor; but having regard to the fact that under the decisions⁸ all property held by the members of a Mitakshara family, as such, is ordinarily coparcenary property, and that in every case it cannot properly be described as "ancestral," it is more convenient to use the term "coparcenary."

WHO ARE COPARCENERS.

Coparceners according to the Bengal school.

Under the Bengal school the coparceners consist of the persons, whether male or female, entitled to shares by inheritance, transfer, or a will. These shares are defined.¹

There is no right of survivorship. On the death of a coparcener his share passes by inheritance or by will. A son, therefore, cannot as such,² as under the Mitakshara law, be a coparcener with his father.

There is thus unity of possession, but not as in the case of the Mitakshara law unity of ownership.

Power of disposition.

Under the Bengal school of law a Hindu may, without any restriction, dispose of his property,³ whether ancestral or self-acquired, by sale, mortgage, gift, or will, whether in favour of strangers or in favour of some of his own issue or relations, to the exclusion of others.⁴

This applies also to property,⁵ the succession to which is governed by the law of primogeniture.

The sons do not acquire any right in their father's property except under his will or as his heirs.⁶

² There might be a case of a son taking by a transfer or a will a share in property in which his father is also a sharer.

³ The property is not coparcenary property, but is on the same footing as self-acquired property.

In Soorjeemoney Dossee (Sreemutty) v. Denobundhoo Mullick (1857),¹ the Supreme Court of Bengal laid down the following propositions with regard to joint property governed by the Bengal school of law :—

1. "Each of the co-sharers has a right to call for a partition,"² but until such partition takes place . . . the whole remains common stock ; the co-sharers being equally interested in every part of it.

2. On the death of an original co-sharer his heirs stand in his place and succeed to his rights as they stood at his death ; his rights may also, in his lifetime, pass to strangers, either by alienation, or, as in the case of creditors, by operation of law ;³ . . . but in all cases those who come in, in the place of the original co-sharer, by inheritance, assignment, or operation of law, can take only his rights as they stand, including, of course, the right to call for a partition.

3. Whatever increment is made to the common stock, whilst the estate continues joint, falls into and becomes part of that stock."

According to the decisions of the High Court of Bengal, ^{Illegitimate son.} an illegitimate son of a Sudra cannot inherit according to the Bengal school. This view has been arrived at by limiting the expression "dasiputra" in the "Dayabhaga"⁴ to the son of a female slave.⁵ His father can give him a share of the property.⁶

Under the Mitakshara law, those persons who by birth ^{Coparceners according to the Mitakshara.} acquire a vested interest⁷ in the coparcenary property are coparceners. By that law a Hindu acquires by birth a vested interest in all coparcenary property⁸ held by his father, or grandfather, or great-grandfather, as members of a joint family, even during their lifetime.⁹

⁸ He does not by birth acquire an interest in a mere right of suit, or in an equitable right to procure an alteration in a grant. Ujagar Singh (Chaudhri) v. Pitam Singh (Chaudhri) (1881), 8 I. All the coparceners are male descendants in the male line of the acquirer of the property.¹

The interest that a son acquires is equal to that of his father. He does not acquire his title through his father, but separately and independently of his father,² and he has no independent dominion over the property.³

The distance in degree from the founder of the family does not affect the right of coparcenership,⁴ but the coparceners are limited to the head of each stock, and his sons, grandsons, and great-grandsons.⁵

Thus the body of coparceners cannot include any individual together with a male descendant of his other than his son, grandson, or great-grandson, or, in other words, no man can be a coparcener if his great-great-grandfather is also a coparcener.

If either his father, grandfather, or great-grandfather survive his great-great-grandfather, then he steps into the coparcenary on the death of the great-great-grandfather. If they all predecease his great-great-grandfather he does not take, but the interest survives to the collaterals, if any. If there is no coparcener, then the heir of the great-great-grandfather takes by inheritance.

degrees removed from the acquirer or original owner of the property sought to be divided, but that it cannot be demanded by one more than four degrees removed from the last owner, however remote he may be from the original owner thereof."

This is the only case in which a male member of a Mitakshara family, who is free from defects which operate as grounds for exclusion from partition,¹ is not a coparcener. As he is not a sapinda of his great-great-grandfather, he does not on his death, in that case, become a coparcener.

"According to the Mitakshara law, all the male descendants of the common ancestor have an interest in the property, and any of them may demand partition,² unless excluded by some disability.³ The descendants of the common ancestor may live together for generations; and when partition is to take place, all that is necessary is to ascertain their mutual relationship. To effect a partition in a case governed by the Dayabhaga it is necessary to know the dates of birth and death of predeceased members. But in a Mitakshara family the surviving members remain in possession of the whole property, as if the predeceased members never existed."⁴

An illegitimate son of a member of one of the three illegitimate regenerate classes acquires no rights as coparcener in coparcenary property.⁵

According to the Mitakshara school, an illegitimate son by a Sudra can inherit⁶ and be a coparcener, if he be not the result of adulterous⁷ or incestuous intercourse.⁸

birth, and therefore cannot claim partition against his father, or dispute his father's dealings with the coparcenary property,¹ but his father can permit him to have a share of the coparcenary property.²

On the death of his father he becomes a coparcener with the legitimate sons, and on their deaths takes by survivorship.³

He can bring a suit against them for partition,⁴ and his sons are entitled to share with the sons of legitimate sons.⁵

In case of a partition between the illegitimate sons and legitimate sons, the former is entitled only to half a share of one of the latter.⁶

As he does not represent his father he has no right as against the undivided brothers of his father or against the sons of such brother.⁷

He is thus only by right a coparcener when there are legitimate sons, and the father has died separated from his brothers.⁸

An illegitimate son who cannot inherit, or be a coparcener, is entitled to maintenance out of the property in which his father was a coparcener.⁹ This right can be enforced against impartible property.¹⁰

The "Viramitrodaya" takes a different view, but the "Mitakshara" (chap. ii. s. 10, para. 3) includes persons who have become impotent. "Manu," chap. ix. para. 201, excludes eunuchs, so apparently non-congenital impotence will be a ground of exclusion. incapacity to walk,¹ lunacy, although not congenital² or incurable.³

If the interest be vested by birth, it cannot be divested by subsequent lunacy.⁴

The rule of Hindu law which disqualifies "idiots" and "madmen" from inheritance, should be enforced only upon the most clear and satisfactory proof that its requirements are satisfied. The rule does not contemplate the disqualification of persons who are merely of weak intellect in the sense that they are not up to the average standard of human intelligence, or endowed with the business capacity to manage their affairs properly.⁵

The ancient text-books also exclude persons suffering from an incurable disease.⁶ Under modern authorities, persons suffering from an aggravated and incurable form of leprosy are excluded.⁷

Although there are no cases on the subject, there seems no reason why the text of the law should not be followed, and why, if it be clearly proved that a person is suffering from a serious and incurable disease such as cancer or phthisis he should not be excluded. In the case of the latter disease, as modern research has produced cures in cases which before were treated as incurable, it would be difficult to prove a case of exclusion. As to the former disease much might depend on the situation and stage of the disease.¹

In ancient times there were many other grounds for exclusion from inheritance and partition, but as they were removable by expiation, it is said that the Courts would not apparently now give effect to them.² There is, however, authority that expiation is necessary.³ For instance, "an enemy to his father" was excluded,⁴ but this portion of the law is now obsolete.⁵

Change of religion and loss of caste do not exclude from inheritance.⁶

Although "Manu"⁷ treats fraud by one of the coparceners as operating as a forfeiture of his share, it seems clear that it has no such effect, but that the defrauding coparcener is merely compelled to bring into partition the property of which he sought to defraud his coparceners.⁸

An excluded person who is cured of his malady after partition is apparently entitled to a share.⁹

¹ K. K. Bhattacharya ("Law of Joint Family," pp. 407, 408) points out the difficulty in holding that a disease is incurable. See Issur Chunder Sein v. Ranee Dossee (1865), 2 W. R. C. R. 125.

This is an exception to the ordinary rule of Hindu law that an estate once vested cannot be divested.

A disqualification arising subsequent to separation does not exclude.¹

It is apparently competent to the other coparceners to waive the objection of disqualification.²

There is nothing to prevent a disqualified person from acquiring property by gift,³ or otherwise than by inheritance or partition.⁴

The burden of proof is upon the person seeking to prove the disability.⁵

The effect of exclusion from participation in the rights of the other members of the family is the same as if the person excluded were dead.⁶

of interest.

In Madras and Bombay a coparcener may renounce his interest in the coparcenary property either in favour of the body of coparceners, or in favour of one or more individual coparcener,⁷ but in Bengal and the United Provinces he cannot renounce such interest except in favour of the whole body of coparceners.⁸ He can only renounce such interest with the acquiescence of the other members on his being given some trifle out of the family property.⁹

RIGHTS OF COPARCENERS.

I. Subject to any power the manager may have to make ^{Rights of coparceners.} arrangements for the enjoyment of the property,¹ each coparcener is entitled to joint possession of the coparcenary property with the other coparceners, and to the full enjoyment thereof.

Although he cannot sue for a share, he is entitled² to enforce his right to joint possession by a suit.³

He can bring a suit within twelve years from the time when his exclusion from the joint family property becomes known to him.⁴

In a case governed by the Bengal school of law, the Judicial Committee said,⁵ "If there be two or more tenants in common, and one (A) be in actual occupation of part of the estate, and is engaged in cultivating that part in a proper course of cultivation as if it were his separate property, and another tenant in common (B) attempts to come upon the said part for the purpose of carrying on operations there inconsistent with the course of cultivation in which A is engaged, and the profitable use by him of the said part, and A resists and prevents such entry, not in denial of B's title, but simply with the object of protecting himself in the profitable enjoyment of the land, such conduct on the part of A would not entitle B to a decree for joint possession. . . . In India a large proportion of the land, including many very large estates, is held in undivided shares, and if one shareholder can restrain another from cultivating a portion of the estate in a proper and husbandlike manner, the whole estate may, by means of cross injunctions, have to remain altogether without cultivation until all the shareholders can agree upon a mode of cultivation to be adopted, or until a partition by metes and bounds can be effected—a work which in ordinary course, in large estates would probably occupy a period including many seasons. In such a case, in a climate like that of India, land which has been brought into cultivation would probably become waste or jungle, and greatly deteriorated in value. In Bengal the courts of justice, in cases where no specific rule exists,⁶ are to act according to justice, equity, and good conscience, and if in a case of shareholders holding lands in common, it should be found that one shareholder is in the act of cultivating a portion of the lands which is not being actually used by another, it would scarcely be consistent with the rule above indicated to restrain him from proceeding with his work, or to allow any other shareholder to appropriate to himself the fruits of the other's labour or capital."

consent.

The Court can prevent a coparcener from altering the nature of the property without the consent of his coparceners, as by building on it, or otherwise interfering with the joint enjoyment.¹ Whether it will do so depends upon the nature of the case. It will not do so in the absence of a real injury.²

By arrangement between the parties, or at the discretion of the manager,³ portions may be occupied as a matter of convenience by individual coparceners. Where the coparceners permit one of their number to occupy a particular portion of the property and to improve it, they cannot oust him.⁴

In the absence of an express agreement no claim for rent can be made against a coparcener occupying coparcenary property.⁵

A coparcener cannot, without the consent of the other coparceners, appropriate a share of the proceeds of family property for the purpose of an investment for himself.⁶

An individual member of a Mitakshara family cannot sue for a share of the coparcenary property,¹ but he can sue for possession jointly with his coparceners.²

There is also authority that he may sue a trespasser alone.³ At any rate, he may do so if he joins his coparceners as parties.

According to all the schools a coparcener is not entitled to sue for a declaration as to the amount of his share,⁴ or to sue his coparceners for a portion of the property held by them.⁵ His remedy is by partition.⁶

A suit by a person excluded from joint family property to enforce a right to share therein must be brought within twelve years from the time when the exclusion becomes known to the plaintiff.⁷ Limitation.

Where it is admitted or proved that the plaintiff was a member of a joint family, the burden of proving his exclusion, and his knowledge of such exclusion, for the period which would bar his right, lies upon the person asserting such exclusion.⁸

It is competent to a person resisting a claim to property, which is alleged to be joint, to prove that he has acquired a right by adverse possession for twelve years.⁹ But as the possession of one member of a joint family is the possession of all,¹⁰ he cannot so acquire such rights unless he proves that the right has been claimed or asserted by other members of the family, and denied by him at least twelve years before suit.¹¹ Adverse possession.

Similarly, a person entitled to property as his separate acquisition may lose his right in consequence of the family having held possession adverse to his exclusive right for a period of twelve years.¹²

II. A coparcener is entitled to receive from the coparcenary property maintenance for himself, his wife, and his children,¹ and for such persons as he is legally or morally bound to support,² and provision for all usual and proper religious observances which should be performed by himself and such persons,³ also provision for the education of his sons, and for the marriage expenses of his daughters,⁴ or of other female dependents of his family.

All ancestral property is, while it remains undisposed of and unpartitioned, charged with the maintenance of all persons who are entitled to maintenance therefrom⁵ in the same sense that the maintenance of a widow is charged upon the estate of her husband.⁶

III. A coparcener is entitled to receive such information as he may require as to the management of the property,⁷ and to be consulted in matters of great importance thereto, such as the sale or mortgage of the property, or of any portion thereof.

IV. A coparcener is entitled to sue to impeach and to restrain the acts of the manager or of other coparceners which are in excess of their powers.¹

V. A coparcener is entitled to obtain a partition of the property when he desires to be separated from the coparcenary.²

This right exists as long as there is a joint tenancy.³

"The rights of the coparceners in . . . an undivided Hindu family governed by the law of the Mitakshara, which consists of a father and his sons, do not differ from those of the coparceners in a like family, which consists of undivided brethren, except so far as they are affected by the peculiar obligation of paying their father's debts, which the Hindu law imposes upon sons,⁴ and the fact that the father is in all cases naturally, and, in the case of infant sons, necessarily, the manager of the joint family estate."⁵

he leaves male issue they represent his rights to a partition.¹ His death has also the effect of introducing into the coparcenary one who is excluded by the rule which limits the coparcenary to four generations.²

This process continues until partition.³

The right to partition determines the right to take by survivorship.⁴

Where there is no coparcener, property, which would otherwise be coparcenary, would pass by inheritance to the heirs of the deceased.⁵ There is no succession while the joint family remains.⁶

Where there is a joint family business the death of a member of the family does not per se dissolve the business.⁷

Under Mitakshara shares not defined.

Under the Mitakshara school, the shares of coparceners are not defined until there be partition, or the members of the family agree among themselves with regard to particular property that it shall henceforth be the subject of ownership in defined shares.⁸

The removal of coparceners by death, and the accession of new coparceners by birth, is continually affecting the interest of the coparceners to the extent that it increases or diminishes the share, which, if there were a partition, would be allotted to them respectively, but until partition no coparcener has a greater interest in the coparcenary property than any one of the other coparceners.

In the well-known case of Appovier v. Rama Subba Aiyar (1866),¹ Lord Westbury said, "According to the true notion of an undivided family in Hindu law, no individual member of that family, whilst it remains undivided, can predicate of the joint and undivided property, that he, that particular member, has a certain definite share. No individual member of an undivided family could go to the place of the receipt of rent and claim to take from the collector or receiver of the rents a certain definite share. The proceeds of undivided property must be brought, according to the theory of an undivided family, to the common chest or purse, and then dealt with according to the modes of enjoyment by the members of an undivided family."²

COPARCENARY PROPERTY.

Coparcenary property consists of—

(a) All property in which the members of a joint family have a common interest and a common possession, and therefore a right to partition.³ Nature of coparcenary property.

"The principle of joint tenancy appears to be unknown to Hindu law, except in the case of coparcenary between the members of an undivided family."⁴ Property held jointly.

Thus property acquired by a transfer to members of the family jointly belongs to the coparcenary.⁵ Joint transfer.

The 45th section of the Transfer of Property Act⁶ is as follows :—

"Where immovable property is transferred for consideration to two or more persons, and such consideration is paid out of a fund belonging to them in common, they are, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, respectively entitled to interests in such property identical, as nearly as may be, with the interests to which they were respectively entitled in the fund; and where such consideration is paid out of separate funds belonging to them respectively, they are, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, respectively entitled to interests in such property in proportion to the shares of the consideration which they respectively advanced.

In the absence of evidence as to the interests in the fund to which they were respectively entitled, or as to the shares which they respectively advanced, such persons shall be presumed to be equally interested in the property."

Acquisitions
by family.

Where property has been acquired jointly in business or otherwise by their joint labour by the members of a joint family, even without resort to the family funds,¹ it is to be presumed to be the property of the family as such,² but this presumption may be rebutted by proof that there was only an ordinary partnership, that is to say, a partnership which was the creature of contract, and not of birth and relationship, in which case the members would be entitled to share in accordance with their shares in the partnership, and there would be no rights of survivorship, or other incidents of coparcenary property.³

The presumption does not apply when the business is carried on by some only of the members of the family without any aid from the family funds.⁴

Mr. Mayne contends that in the case of property acquired by the joint exertions of the members of the family, but without any aid from the family funds, the sons would acquire no interest by birth.⁵

"If the joint acquirers intended to hold the property so acquired as co-owners, and not as joint family property in the Mitakshara sense of that expression, this view would be perfectly sound. But if, as supposed, the property was acquired by all the members of the undivided family, by their joint labour, it would, in the absence of any indication of intention to the contrary, be owned by them as joint family property, and in that case their male issue, who, by their birth, become members of such undivided family, necessarily acquire a right by birth in such property."¹

In the case of a gift or a devise to the members of a joint family, the property would, in the absence of any term in the gift or devise which would show a different intention, be held as coparcenary property.²

It has been suggested³ that this view might be inconsistent with the Tagore case,⁴ inasmuch as unborn persons might on birth obtain rights in the coparcenary. It is submitted that recent decisions as to a gift to a class⁵ negative this suggestion.

As to a babuana grant for the benefit of a junior member of the family and his direct male line, see Ramchunder Marwari v. Mudeswar Singh (1906), 33 Calc. 1158; 10 C. W. N. 979.

Whether property, which may have been ancestral, but has been acquired by virtue of a compromise or arrangement, belongs to the coparcenary depends upon the nature of the arrangement.⁶

Property inherited from the maternal grandfather by two persons living as members of a joint family⁷ is, in a case governed by the Mitakshara law, on a similar footing.

A full bench of the Madras High Court has declined to extend this principle to sister's sons, and expressed their inability to apply it "to cases other than those in which the inheritance devolves from a paternal or maternal male ancestor on his lineal descendants whether as 'unobstructed,' or as 'obstructed heritage.'" They point out that the distinction between the two cases is that whereas the class of daughters is incapable of being added to after the vesting, the class of sister's sons would be added to after the vesting by the birth of others.¹

succession.

(b) In cases governed by the Mitakshara school of law, all property, whether movable or immovable,² and however originally acquired,³ which is inherited by what is called "unobstructed heritage,"⁴ i.e. which is inherited from a natural or adopted⁵ father, is coparcenary property⁶ as regards the issue of the person so inheriting it.⁷

"In the 'Mitakshara,' chap. i. s. 1, v. 3, heritage is said to be 'of two sorts, unobstructed, or liable to obstruction. The wealth of the father or paternal grandfather becomes the property of his sons or of his grandsons in right of their being his sons or grandsons, and that is an inheritance not liable to obstruction. But property devolves on parents

⁴ Apratibandha Daya (inheritance not liable to be obstructed) as distinguished from Sapratibandha Daya (inheritance liable to be obstructed, post, p. 261). The distinction between the two forms of heritage is the same as the distinction between inheritance by an heir at law, and inheritance by an heir presumptive. In the latter case there is a possibility of a nearer heir being born. In the former case there is no such possibility.

(or uncles), brothers, and the rest upon the demise of the owner, if there be no male issue; and thus the actual existence of a son and the survival of the owner are impediments to the succession; and, on their ceasing, the property devolves on the successor in right of his being uncle or brother. This is an inheritance subject to obstruction."¹

Property inherited after the death of a widow to whom it was assigned in lieu of maintenance is on the same footing.²

It is only the descendants of the person so inheriting, who acquire an interest in the property. Collateral relations who happen to be joint with such person acquire no such interest.³

(c) In cases governed by the Mitakshara school of law, property inherited from a mother⁴ is coparcenary, but it is unsettled whether property inherited from the maternal grandfather is also coparcenary property.

The Madras decisions hold that property inherited by a daughter's son is coparcenary.⁵ The Bengal and Allahabad High Courts have entertained a different view,⁶ and there is no reported decision in Bombay on the subject.⁷

The Judicial Committee has held that such property is not "self-acquired,"⁸ and therefore it follows, that it is coparcenary, with all the incidents of coparcenary property.⁹

on partition.

(d) In cases governed by the Mitakshara school of law, the share of coparcenary property allotted to any member on partition becomes coparcenary property as regards his issue,² whether such issue were or were not born at the time of partition.³

The circumstance that the person to whom the property is allotted discharges it from encumbrances does not alter its nature.⁴ If the person to whom the property has been allotted has no issue, it passes to his heir.⁵

by father.

(e) Self-acquired property, given or devised by a Hindu governed by the Mitakshara school of law to a son is, according to the High Courts of Bengal and Madras, in the absence of any contrary intention appearing from the gift or will,⁶ to be taken to be coparcenary property, so far as the issue of that son are concerned.⁷ The Bombay and Allahabad High Courts repudiate such presumption.⁸

(f) The joint property of reunited coparceners.³

Reunion.

(g) Property which was originally the separate⁴ property of an individual member of a joint family, but has been treated by him as coparcenary property, belongs to the coparcenary.⁵

Property treated as coparcenary.

Where the members of a family having coparcenary property put their separate earnings into the joint stock, the proceeds of such earnings are to be presumed to be joint.⁶ The treatment must be such as to show unmistakably an intention to throw the property into the common stock. Where it is plain that no gift can have been intended, none can be inferred.⁷

The right to claim property as separate may be barred by the operation of the law of Limitation.⁸

acquisitions.

(h) Accretions to coparcenary property. Property acquired out of the income or with the aid¹ or on the credit of coparcenary property, whether movable or immovable,³ the income of such property,⁴ the proceeds of sale of such property, and property purchased out of such proceeds,⁵ or from movable property belonging to the family,⁶ are coparcenary property.

In a case governed by the Mitakshara law, a son acquires an interest in such property, whether he was or was not born⁷ or adopted⁸ before the date of the acquisition.

Slight or indirect aid.

Even where the acquirer has received some aid from the family property he is entitled to treat the acquisition as separate, if the family property has not contributed in a material degree to the acquisition,⁹ and was not directly instrumental in bringing it about.¹⁰ See post, pp. 256, 257.

"It seems agreed that maintenance in the family, during the period of separate acquisition, though it contribute to the end, is not alone sufficient to affect it with a joint character, the expenditure for the purpose being incidental."¹

It has been held that property acquired by a coparcener while drawing an income from coparcenary property is joint.²

As to property acquired by the exercise of a profession, see post, pp. 257, 258.

The form of the transfer³ or the fact that the property was purchased or settled in the name of a particular member of the family⁴ is immaterial.⁵

Property purchased from the income of an impartible estate governed by the Mitakshara school of law, and the savings from the income of such estate not appropriated by the owner, or disposed of by his will, will form part of the estate.⁶

Savings from impartible estates.

The estate itself cannot be regarded as coparcenary property, inasmuch as by the custom of the family, it is held by a single individual.⁷

It was formerly considered that coparcenary property would include property which by custom is held and enjoyed by a single member of the family, but in which there was a right of survivorship.⁸

the property claimed in Raghunadha's case¹ was impartible, but at one time it was the common notion that even in impartible property all the male members of a joint family were coparceners subject to the qualification that the enjoyment was by one member of the family alone, and it was considered, rightly or wrongly, that there was warrant for this view in a number of decisions of the Privy Council, and notably Naragunt v. Vengama,² Shivagunga case,³ the Tipperah case,⁴ Stree Rajah Yamanula Venkayamah v. Stree Rajah Yamanula Boochia Venkondara,⁵ Chowdhry Chintamun Singh v. Mussamut Nowlucko Konwari.⁶ I mention these cases as to all of them Sir James Colville, who delivered the judgment in Raghunadha's case, was a party; and if it was his view that the impartible zemindari belonged to the whole family, then the decision in Raghunadha's case would seem to have proceeded on circumstances very closely resembling those with which we are now dealing. But whatever may have been the opinion that prevailed at that time, it has now been definitely decided by the Privy Council in Rani Surtaj Kuari v. Rani Devraj Kuari,⁷ and in Sri Raja Rao Venkata Surya v. Court of Wards,⁸ that in impartible properties there is no coparcenary, so that in the light of these latter decisions it cannot be said that the conditions in Raghunadha's case were in all respects identical with those now under consideration."

Presumption.

If the owner of an estate, the devolution of which is governed by family custom, acquires separate property, but does not in his lifetime alienate the property so acquired, or dispose of it by his will, or leave behind him some indication of a contrary intention, the reasonable presumption is that he intended to incorporate it with the family estate.⁹

Coparcenary as regards some coparceners only.

Property may be coparcenary as regards some members of a joint family, while other members of the family, although coparceners in the family property, have no share therein.¹⁰ Thus, if a coparcener dies leaving self-acquired property,¹ such property becomes the coparcenary property of his descendants, but his collateral coparceners have no interest therein.²

The coparcenary may also be trustees of property devoted to religious or pious uses.³ This class of property is incapable of partition.⁴ Endowed property.

SEPARATE PROPERTY.

It is competent to a member of a joint family to acquire property for himself independently of his coparceners. Such separate acquisitions can be dealt with at the pleasure of the acquirer.⁵ In default of a will they pass to the heirs of the acquirer,⁶ who will, in cases under the Mitakshara law, if he be a son, take them as coparcenary property.⁷ Separate property.

As to the power of a father to divide his self-acquired property unequally amongst his sons, see post, p. 335.

Property acquired in the following ways are the absolute property of the acquirer. Other members of the family have no interest therein.⁸

Such property is not liable to partition because it has been acquired without detriment to the estate of the father or mother.¹ •

acquisitions.

(a) Property acquired by an individual member of the joint family by his own exertions,² or from his separate capital, or on his own credit,³ without any help from, or detriment to, the coparcenary property.⁴

share.

Where with comparatively small aid from the coparcenary property the separate acquisition of a distinct property is made by an individual member by his own labour or capital, the acquirer, according to the Bengal authorities, is entitled to a double share on partition,⁵ no such share being given in case of the common stock being only improved or augmented.⁶

It has been suggested⁷ that the extra share allotted to the acquirer may be treated by him as self-acquired.

Whether this limitation will be accepted by the Judicial Committee or will be adopted in the other Provinces may be open to question.

Mr. Mayne¹ says that the text of Vasishtha,² on which it is founded, "probably applied originally to self-acquisition properly so called, and that it cut down the rights of a self-acquirer, instead of enlarging the rights of one who has made use of common property. The Smriti Chandrika and Madhaviya both restrict the text to the gains of learning, when considered to be partible in consequence of the education from which they sprung having been imparted at the expense of the family."³ The general principles laid down by Vijnanesvara seem to exclude the idea that any special and exclusive benefit can be obtained to any co-heir by a use of the family property.⁴ Mr. W. Macnaghten states that under Benares law no such benefit can be obtained, whatever may have been the personal exertions of any individuals, but that the rule does not exist in Bengal."⁵

Under the Bengal school of law the father takes a double share in acquisitions made by a son; if they have been made by the use of joint funds the father and the acquirer take two shares each, and the rest of the brothers one share each; but if made without the use of joint funds the acquisitions are divided half and half between the father and the son. A father claiming a share of property acquired by his son is not bound to allow the son any share of the ancestral property in his hands.⁶

This rule has no application when the son has separated from his father.⁷

practice of a (learned) profession or occupation, where the property of the family has not been used for acquiring such property, or in the special education, which was necessary for the purpose of practising such profession.¹

A mere general education or maintenance, even during the time of the acquisition,² at the expense of the family, would not, apparently, make the profits of the profession coparcenary property,³ but a special education for the particular profession would stand upon a different footing.

Gifts and bequests.

(c) Gifts on marriage⁴ or on other occasions,⁵ and bequests.

The payment of the marriage expenses out of coparcenary property does not render the marriage gifts joint property.⁶

A babuana grant of ancestral property by the owner of an impartible estate, to enure for the benefit not only of a junior member of the family, but of his direct male line, does not lose its ancestral character by the grant.⁷

the aid of the family property¹ from a stranger holding adversely to the family.²

There must have been an express or implied abandonment of their rights by the coparceners, and the coparceners must have been in a position to sue.³

Where the property recovered under these conditions consists of land,⁴ the recoverer, except perhaps he be the father, is not entitled to the property absolutely, but he is entitled on partition to take one-fourth share as a reward for the recovery, and he has to share the remainder with his brethren.⁵

Where the recoverer is the father, the Mitakshara would apparently give him the whole of the property,⁶ but the Bengal authorities are said to make no distinction between a recovery by the father or one by another coparcener.⁷

The redemption of property is not a recovery within the meaning of this rule.⁸

establishing the contrary is thrown on the member of the family who disputes it.”¹

“The fact of the Hindu family is enough to put the purchaser upon inquiry, and if he deals with a single member without obtaining proof that the property is separate property he does so at his own risk.”²

There has been some conflict as to whether it is necessary for the person claiming the property as joint to prove that there was a nucleus of family property from which the property in question might have been acquired, or whether mere proof that the acquirer was at the time of the acquisition a member of a Hindu family is not sufficient.³ Mr. Mayne⁴ seeks to reconcile these decisions by pointing out how the burden of proof varies in accordance with the nature of the claim to separate property.

It is difficult, if not impossible, to lay down a rule which will suit the circumstances of each case, but every weight must be given to the practice of sharing property in common as members of a joint family which prevails among Hindus. It rarely happens that a case depends upon the mere necessity to prove the existence of a nucleus of family property.

Where there is such a nucleus it is clear that the burden is upon the person who alleges that the property was a separate acquisition.¹

When it is proved that there was family property, the fruits of which were capable of providing for the acquisition of the property in question, then the person claiming the property as a separate acquisition must prove that the family property was not used for the acquisition.²

The fact that the property had increased during a long period to a considerable value from a small nucleus of family property is not sufficient to repeat the presumption that it was all family property.³

Use of name
member.

The purchase of property in the name of one member of the family, or the use of his name in documents relating to the property,⁴ or in the carrying on of law suits by him alone,⁵ or an entry of his name in revenue records,⁶ does not by itself show that the acquisition was separate, or that there had been a separation, particularly where that member is the managing member of the family;⁷ but where a purchaser from such member has been misled, the family may, in some cases, be estopped from claiming the property as joint,⁸ and in conjunction with other evidence of separation, or of separate acquisition, such evidence may be of importance.⁹

The presumption may be rebutted by showing that the property has been self-acquired from separate funds, without the aid of the coparcenary property, and that the property is held separately,¹ or by proof of separation before the acquisition, or by proof that at the time of acquisition there was no family property out of which it could have been acquired,² or by proof of separation after the purchase, and exclusive possession of the property thereafter.³

Rebuttal of presumption.

Evidence as to the source of the purchase-money is generally the most satisfactory mode of proof, but it is not indispensable.⁴

Where it is admitted or proved that property in dispute was not acquired by use of coparcenary funds,⁵ or that a partition has already taken place,⁶ the burden lies upon the person alleging the property to be joint.

Where property was in its origin a separate acquisition of an individual member of the family, the burden of proving that it has become joint property, i.e. that its character has been changed by treatment,⁷ is on the person making the assertion.⁸

Originally a separate acquisition.

There is no presumption that a family possesses any particular property,¹ or any property at all.² A person who claims a share in property as belonging to a joint family, of which he is admitted or has been proved to be a member, must prove either that the property was held or acquired by the members of the family as such,³ or that the person in whose possession it is is a member of the family.⁴

Possession of property.

He may, of course, rebut evidence of self-acquisition by evidence as to the source of the acquisition, or by other evidence tending to show that the property was joint.

C. 164, at p. 167, where it was said, "He must, at least, show that the defendants whom he sues constitute a joint family, and that the property in question became joint property when acquired, or that at some period since its acquisition, it has been enjoyed jointly by that family."

CHAPTER VII.

MANAGEMENT AND DISPOSAL OF PROPERTY OF JOINT FAMILY.

"The proceeds of undivided property must be brought, according to the theory of an undivided family, to the common chest or purse, and there dealt with according to the mode of enjoyment by the members of an undivided family."¹

Application of proceeds of coparcenary property.

This principle was laid down in a case governed by the Mitakshara school of law, but it would apply also to a joint family governed by the Bengal school of law, it being remembered that in the latter case sons have not during their father's lifetime any interest in the family chest or purse.

Although a coparcener is not entitled ordinarily to credit for moneys paid by him out of his own funds for the benefit of the family on the improvement of the estate,² he is entitled to such credit where it is clear that he reserved his right to such credit, as where he paid the money to save the coparcenary estate from sale for arrears of Government revenue.³

Payments on behalf of family.

Except where in a coparcenary governed by the Mitakshara the father has power to act independently of his sons,⁴ each coparcener must either himself, or by a manager having power in that behalf, be a party to every transaction relating to the coparcenary property.⁵

All coparceners to be parties to transactions.

No coparcener, unless he be the manager, has power to enhance rent or eject tenants at his pleasure.¹

It has been held² that payment to one of several joint proprietors is a payment to all. This would, it is submitted, depend upon the circumstances. Where there is a manager a tenant would rarely be entitled to pay to any other coparcener. Under some circumstances a debtor might get a discharge by payment to one coparcener,³ but it would ordinarily be safer for him to require a receipt from the manager or from the whole body of coparceners.

Parties to suits.

All the coparceners must be parties to a suit or execution proceedings relating to the coparcenary property,⁴ or to a trade or business belonging to the family,⁵ even if it be founded on a transaction which was validly entered into by the manager,⁶ but a decree made against the father⁷ or other manager, as representing the family, without any objection being made as to want of parties, may bind the other coparceners.⁸

Thus one coparcener cannot sue alone to eject a tenant,⁹ and cannot sue for enhancement of rent,¹ or for his share of the rent,² unless by an express or implied arrangement between the coparceners and the tenant he collects his share separately.³

In Rumayya v. Venkataratnam,⁴ where a suit was brought by a manager as representative of the family, the Court considered that the omission to make the coparcener a party was a mere formal error.

When a coparcener declines to be a plaintiff,⁵ or where he is acting in collusion with the tenant⁶ or other person sued, he may be joined as a defendant.

If the suit be barred against some of them, the whole suit fails.⁷

entered into a contract in his own name he can enforce it alone.¹

Where he has been put in possession of a portion of the property by the others, he may be able to sue alone in respect of it.²

A coparcener can sue for damages for an act by which he is individually damaged.³

MANAGER.

Manager.

The property of a joint family is ordinarily managed by one of the coparceners who represents the family to the outside world. The father, if living, of a family governed by the Mitakshara school of law would be the manager.⁴ In other cases, the eldest male member of the family would ordinarily, but not necessarily, be selected.⁵

When the coparceners cannot agree as to the selection of a manager, a partition seems to be the only practical remedy.

In Bengal the manager is called the "Karta."

The manager is not an ordinary agent of the family.⁶ He is thus described by Mr. Cowell⁷: "When, therefore, we come to define the relation of each member, especially of the managing member, to the joint family and the joint estate, we are brought into contact with a relationship which has no counterpart in English law. Neither the term 'partner,' nor 'principal,' nor 'agent,' nor even 'coparcener,' will strictly apply. He is, in fact, a sort of representative owner, his independent rights being limited on all sides by the correlative rights of others, and burdened with a liability, coextensive with his ownership, to provide for the maintenance of the family."

In dealing with the same question, the Judicial Committee said,¹ "The relation of such persons is not that of principal, or agent, or of partners; it is much more like that of trustee and cestui que trust."

The manager is the de facto guardian of the interests of minor coparceners in the coparcenary property.²

Guardianship of share in
property.

"A guardian of the property of an infant cannot properly be appointed in respect of the infant's interest in the property of an undivided Mitakshara family . . . on the plain ground that the interest of a member of such a family is not individual property at all, and that therefore a guardian, if appointed, would have nothing to do with the family property."³ These observations of the Judicial Committee would apparently apply also to the appointment of a guardian by a High Court.⁴ This principle does not apply when all the coparceners are minors and a guardian of the property is appointed of the whole number, but the order should reserve liberty to any minor

⁴ In In re Manilal Hurgovan (1900),

25 Bom. 353, the High Court of Bombay, under its general jurisdiction, and apart from the Guardians and Wards Act, appointed a guardian of the interest of a minor in property held by a family governed by the Mitakshara school of Hindu law. In doing so the Court said (at p. 357), "But in coming to this conclusion we desire to add that it is a power to be exercised with the greatest caution. We make the appointment in this case because the person applying to be appointed the guardian is also the manager of the family to which the minor belongs, and thus we do not introduce into the family any element of possible disturbance. I can hardly imagine a case in which it would be right to grant such an appointment unless the applicant were the manager, and it is expressly upon this ground that we make the appointment in this case." See also Jairam Luxmon (1892), 16 Bom. 634; Jagannath Ranji (1893), 19 Bom. 96.

on attaining majority to apply for removal of the guardian or restriction of his power.¹

Where the minor has separate property there would be no objection to the appointment of a guardian,² and in any case a guardian of his person can be appointed.³

Representation of authority.

When the members of the family have represented that a member other than the manager is entitled to act as such, they are bound by his acts in the same as if he had been de jure manager.⁴

manager.

The duty of the father or other manager is to manage the property of the joint family for the benefit of such family as a whole; to realize the income of the family property, pay the debts⁵ and other outgoings connected with the management, and expend the residue for the benefit of the family and its members. He must provide for the maintenance, education, marriages, shrads, and other usual religious expenses of the coparceners,⁶ and of such members of their family as they are, or were when alive, legally or morally bound to maintain,⁷ including their illegitimate sons when not coparceners,⁸ and also of persons disqualified from inheritance and their families.⁹ In expending money for the benefit of an individual member or his family, he need not take into account the share which such member would be entitled to on a partition.¹⁰

Widows and daughters entitled to maintenance out of coparcenary property would lose the right under the same circumstances as those which would deprive them of maintenance from the separate estate of their deceased husband or father.¹

"Of course no member of a joint Hindu family is liable to his coparceners for anything which might have been actually consumed by him in consequence of his having a larger family to support, or of his being subject to greater expenses than the others; but this is simply because all such expenses are justly considered to be the legitimate expenses of the whole family. Thus, for instance, one member of a joint Hindu family may have a larger number of daughters to marry than the others. The marriage of each of those daughters to a suitable bridegroom is an obligation incumbent upon the whole family so long as it continues to be joint, and the expenses incurred on account of such marriage must be necessarily borne by all the members without any reference whatever to respective interests in the family estate."²

It is competent to the members of the family to make a special arrangement as to the accountability of the manager,³ or as to the way in which the family is to be managed. Arrangement as to management.

By arrangement a manager may keep a separate account of expenditure on behalf of a particular member of the family, and on a partition such member may become liable for the amount appearing due on such account.⁴ Separate account of expenditure.

In a suit for partition a coparcener can require the manager to furnish an account of his dealings with the coparcenary property for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the property to be partitioned.⁵ Account by manager.

In the case of a partition between members who have been in possession of different portions there may be no such right to an account.⁶

Although he does not seek for partition, a coparcener, who does not himself take part in the management of the property, may at any time by suit require the manager to account for his dealings with the family property,¹ but he is not entitled, while he remains undivided, to require any particular share of the profits to be made over to him.²

The cost of taking such account would probably not be on the same footing as the costs of an account, which is ancillary to partition. The Court would probably, unless default appeared in the manager's accounts, or unless the manager had declined to render any information to his coparceners, or where the person seeking the account was in possession of complete information as to the accounts, require the coparcener asking for an account to pay the costs. Where the account is ancillary to the partition, the costs would ordinarily be borne in proportion to the shares.

In furnishing such account, the managing member of a joint family is entitled to credit for all sums of money bonâ fide spent by him for the benefit of the joint family. He must be debited with all sums which he has actually misappropriated, or which he has spent for purposes other than those in which the joint family was interested.³

"What that account should be, so as to discharge him from his liability to account as manager, and what objections the other members can take to it, must . . . depend on the conduct of the manager and the other members, the nature of the property, and the circumstances of the family, and cannot be satisfactorily stated in definite terms."⁴

An arrangement between the coparceners as to the management of the property may be such as to render the manager liable to an account on the footing of an ordinary agency.⁵

A coparcener is not, except under special circumstances, entitled to ask for an account of a portion of the property only. Where a trading business forms a part of the assets of the joint family, one member cannot sue for an account of past profits and losses, apart from the accounts of the joint family.¹

The manager represents the family in transactions with outsiders. He has the ordinary powers incident to the due management of the property;² but he can act only with the assent, express or implied, of the body of coparceners.³

Where a portion of the family assets consists of a trade or other business, the manager, or other member of the family in charge of the business, has all the powers which are usually exercised by a person carrying on such business, and can bind the members of the family by debts properly incurred for the purposes of the business,⁴ but minor members are only liable to the extent of the assets of the business, i.e. the joint family property.⁵

“A trade like other personal property is descendible amongst Hindus, but it does not follow that a Hindu infant, who by birth or inheritance becomes entitled to an interest in a joint family business, becomes at the same time a member of the trading partnership which carries on the business. He can only become a member of the partnership by a consentient act on the part of himself and the partners."¹

The manager cannot start a new business so as to bind minor coparceners,² or adult coparceners who do not consent.

The fact that all the coparceners are partners in the business must, if disputed, be proved.³

Where the business is carried on by the manager on behalf of the family in partnership with a stranger, the death of the manager dissolves the partnership.⁴

Debts.

Where the manager has contracted debts for a proper joint family purpose, the coparcenary property is liable.⁵ The members of the family are liable to the extent of family property which has come to their hands, and if the manager or any other member of the party pays more than his share he can require the others to contribute.⁶

There is no presumption that the action of a manager in contracting debts, etc., is on behalf of the joint family,⁷ or that it is within his authority.⁸

Promissory notes.

It has been held that where the manager borrows money on promissory notes for the purpose of a joint family business, or to meet a joint family necessity, the creditor can recover the money from all the members of the family, although they were not all parties to the notes.⁹ It is submitted that no one but a party to a promissory note can be held liable thereunder,¹⁰ although the family may be liable for the debt.

Where the manager contracts a debt which is binding not only on the persons executing the contract but on the other members of the joint family to which he belongs, the creditor may elect to treat the debt as a personal debt, and sue the manager personally, or he may sue him as representative of the family,¹ or the whole family.

Election by creditor.

In the former case he can only realize his debt from the share of the manager;² in the latter case he can recover it from the family property.³

Although a manager may have power to deal with the property,⁴ he has no power to bind the other members of the family personally.⁵

In the absence of fraud or collusion, the manager can bind the estate by a compromise,⁶ or by a reference to arbitration.⁷

Compromise.

He can pay interest on a debt, or can acknowledge one, so as to extend the period of limitation,⁸ but he has no power to pay or receive a debt which is barred by limitation, except as against himself.⁹

A coparcener is entitled to have a contract made by the manager without authority or in fraud of the family rescinded.¹⁰

Arrangements. A manager has power to make all necessary arrangements as to the mode of enjoyment of the joint property by the coparceners, as to their commensality, and as to their religious duties and observances.¹

Where a son had taken possession of a portion of the coparcenary property against the will of his father, who was the manager, he was ejected.²

Discretion of manager.

Where the discretion of the managing member is exercised bonâ fide and for the benefit of the estate, and the family have the benefit, such discretion should not be narrowly scrutinized.³

Decree against manager.

The members of a family are all bound by a decree obtained bonâ fide against the manager, as such, for a debt duly incurred in the management of the property, whether it were or were not charged upon the family property, and by a sale of the family property in pursuance of such decree, or in any suit brought in respect of the family property,⁴ although they were not parties to the suit.⁵ When they are of age and acquiesce in the conduct of the suit by their father, or other manager, the coparceners would the more clearly be bound by the decree.⁶

If a manager (with the acquiescence, express or implied, of the adult members of the family) bring a suit on behalf of the family, and no objection be made by the defendant, a decree can be made; but a defendant may protect himself by insisting that the other members of the family be brought on the record.¹ There is a conflict of decisions as to whether, in a suit on a mortgage instituted since the Transfer of Property Act² came into force, any but the actual parties are bound.³

In Kashinath Chinnaji v. Chinnaji Sadashiv,⁴ Scott, J., sitting on the Original side of the Bombay High Court, said, "As a matter of practice suits are not filed in this Court⁵ by managers representing their infant coparceners; the practice is to join all parties interested, but it would seem that even if in the face of the plaint there was an allegation of a sole plaintiff that he sued as manager on behalf of a coparcenary, the minor coparcener would not be bound by proceedings, unless by judicial sale under the decree, rights had been created in third parties, and no prejudice were shown to the absent minors."

As to parties to suits, see ante, p. 268.

All members of a family are bound by decrees in suits brought by or against the manager of a joint family business as such, even though they are not parties to the suit;⁶ but in a suit brought by such manager the defendant may insist upon all the members of the family who are members of the partnership being brought upon the record.⁷

Minor members of the family who have not by a consentient act become members of the partnership are not necessary parties to the suit.⁸

The decree on a mortgage is equally binding when the manager happens to have been appointed as guardian by the Court, but has obtained no sanction from the Court.¹

An appeal by the manager as representative of the family is on the same footing as a suit brought by him.²

When a suit on a mortgage or other contract has been brought against the manager, it has been held that there is nothing to prevent another suit against the other members of the family on the same cause of action.³

A decree, even for a joint family debt, in a suit by or against the manager alone, and not as representing the family, does not bind his coparceners,⁴ and cannot be executed against the coparcenary property.⁵ If a sale takes place in execution of such decree the interest of the defendant alone passes thereby.⁶

ALIENATION AND CHARGE.

Alienation by coparcenary.

Where all the coparceners are adults they can together effect a valid sale or charge of the coparcenary property.⁷ A sale or charge can also be made by the adult coparceners, and the manager acting on behalf of the minor coparceners in case of necessity.⁸

Alienation by manager.

A manager can alienate or charge the family property with the express or implied consent of all the then existing adult coparceners, so as to bind them.⁹

Ratification is equivalent to consent.¹

It is unsettled whether a manager can, even in the case of necessity,² alienate the family estate, so far as adult coparceners are concerned, without their assent, either express or implied.

The decisions are in conflict.³ The texts of the Mitakshara⁴ upon which the law on the subject is based do not extend to such a case.

It is submitted that in case of necessity⁵ the consent may be presumed,⁶ but that where there is an express dissent, of which the purchaser had notice, or which he had means of knowing, there could be no valid sale or charge.

As to the powers of a father in a family governed by the Mitakshara law, to sell or charge the property to pay his debts, see post, pp. 306-310.

Where the parties intend that all the coparceners should execute the transfer, the document does not take effect by reason only that the managing member has signed it, and that there is a recital of necessity.⁷

Where there is neither consent nor necessity, a manager, other than the father,¹ cannot alienate the family property by sale, mortgage, gift, permanent lease,² or otherwise.

Gift by father. Under the Mitakshara law, a father can make a gift of a small portion of the movable coparcenary property for pious purposes, or as a gift of affection, i.e. to a child or other near relative.³ He can also devote a small portion of the immovable property to pious purposes,⁴ but not for any other purpose.⁵ He cannot do so by will.⁶

Movables. There is some authority that, even under the Mitakshara law, a father has complete power of disposition over ancestral movables,⁷ but it is submitted that he has no greater power over movables than he has over immovable property.⁸

Powers of father. With these exceptions, and except so far as he has power to alienate the property for payment of his debts,⁹ the powers of the father over coparcenary property are not in law greater than those of any other manager.¹⁰

Having regard to his position, greater deference will necessarily be paid to his wishes than in the case of any other manager.¹

In case of necessity,² the father or other manager³ can bind the interest of a minor coparcener by a sale or charge.⁴

This principle was laid down in the leading case of *Hunooman Persaud Panday v. Munraj Koonweree (Mussamut Babooee)*⁵ with regard to the manager for an infant heir, but it has been applied to the managers of joint families acting on behalf of infant coparceners,⁶ to widows and daughters inheriting property from their husbands and fathers,⁷ to the managers of religious endowments,⁸ to managers on behalf of lunatics,⁹ and to the holders of impartible estates, which are inalienable by custom.¹⁰

from necessity.

In that case it was said that the power "can only be exercised rightly in a case of need or for the benefit of the estate." Of the large number of cases in which the principles contained in *Hunooman Persaud Panday's*¹ case have been applied, there is not, so far as the writer is aware, any one in which a sale or charge has been justified by benefit apart from necessity, except the case of Ratnam v. Govindarajulu,² where the money was originally raised for, amongst other purposes, enlarging the family dwelling-house, but in that case, as the debt in question was raised for the purpose of paying an antecedent debt, the question as to the original loan did not really arise (see post, p. 285). Apart from necessity, it is not easy to say what is for the benefit of the estate. It is clearly not intended that this power should authorize a sale or charge for the purpose only of increasing the immediate income of the estate.³

Manager
having powers given by Court.

When the manager of a joint family is acting under the authority of Court, as when he has been appointed a guardian under Act VIII. of 1890,⁴ or is acting as administrator under the Probate and Administration Act,⁵ his powers are limited by the provisions of the Acts under the authority of which he has received an appointment; but as in the case of a family governed by the Mitakshara school of law a guardian cannot be appointed of the interest of a minor in coparcenary property,⁶ where such appointment has been made it will not interfere with his powers as manager under Hindu law.⁷

Matters to be regarded.

"Where, in the particular instance, the charge is one that a prudent owner would make in order to benefit the estate, the bonâ fide lender is not affected by the precedent mismanagement of the estate. The actual pressure on

Humid Ali (Kazi)* (1886), 9 All. 340 (a case under Act XL. of 1858), it was held that there being no sanction, the guardian was relegated to the powers he would have had, if he had not been appointed by the Court. The High Court of Bengal has taken a different view in the estate, the danger to be averted, or the benefit to be conferred upon it in the particular instance, is the thing to be regarded. But, of course, if that danger arises, or has arisen, from any misconduct to which the lender is or has been a party, he cannot take advantage of his own wrong to support a charge in his own favour against the heir, grounded on a necessity which his wrong has helped to cause. Therefore, the lender . . . unless he is shown to have acted malâ fide, will not be affected, though it be shown that with better management the estate might have been kept free from debt.”¹

All circumstances of pressure which render the raising of money necessary for the protection or preservation of the estate, or for the personal well-being of the coparceners, would support a sale or charge.

What amounts to necessity.

Baboo K. K. Bhattacharya, in his “Law of the Joint Hindu Family,”² says, “Legal necessity is of various forms. All the indispensable religious ceremonies, the sacraments, such as marriage and the investiture with the sacred thread, the obsequies, the cremation, the periodical oblations to the manes, the ceremonies customary in the family, the subsistence of the family, the education of the younger members, the payment of the ancestral debts, the giving of presents at particular seasons and on special occasions to the relatives, these and a thousand other causes of expenditure are constantly cropping up in a fairly prosperous Hindu joint family. All these are, in the strict sense of the word, lawful necessities.”

The following are proper objects for the raising of money:—

(a) The payment of Government revenue or of other debts which are payable out of the estate.³

The debts of the father or other person through whom the property has been acquired by inheritance, will, or gift, must be paid, provided they are such as to bind the estate,¹ and therefore the payment of them constitutes a sufficient necessity for sale of mortgage,² although no suit may have been instituted for the purpose of recovering them.³ Where there is a decree the necessity is the more pressing.⁴

According to Hindu law, the payment of a father's debt, even in his lifetime, is a pious duty on the part of a son.⁵ In the case of a family governed by the Mitakshara school of Hindu law, the discharge of such debt is therefore such a necessary purpose as to give validity to a sale or mortgage of ancestral property by the father,⁶ or after his death,⁷ by the manager, whether the sons be minors or adults, provided that the debt has not been incurred for illegal or immoral purposes.

(b) The maintenance of the coparceners and of the persons whom they are legally or morally bound to maintain.⁸

(c) The reasonable marriage expenses of the female members of his family.⁹

The marriage of male members of the family does not in Mitakshara cases appear to justify a sale or charge,¹⁰ but in a case governed by

¹ Debts barred by limitation do not justify an alienation by the manager, Melgirappa v. Shirappa (1869), 6 Bom. H. C. 270; Dinkar v. Appaji (1894), 20 Bom. 155. See *Chinnaya Naidu v. Bengal law the sale of a share would, it is submitted, be justified. It is submitted that under both schools the sale of separate property would be justified.¹

(d) The performance of an indispensable religious duty,² such as the initiatory ceremony of a member of the family,³ the funeral ceremonies⁴ or shradh of a member of the family, or of the widow of a member,⁵ or a debt incurred on account of such expenditure.⁶

(e) Necessary legal expenses.⁷

The instrument effecting a sale or creating a charge need not contain any recital of necessity,⁸ but it is always better to insert such recital therein. Recital of necessity.

In determining whether a sale or mortgage for a family necessity is justifiable, a reasonable latitude must be allowed for the exercise of the manager's judgment, especially in the case of a father or of a manager of a trading family, though this must not be extended so far as to free the persons dealing with him from the need of all precautions where a minor has an interest in the property.⁹ Discretion of manager.

The circumstance that to meet the necessities of his ward the manager has pledged his personal credit, does not disentitle him to charge or sell the property,¹⁰ but he Manager may sell to repay money borrowed on personal credit.

can only charge or sell it for the purpose of paying money which the minor was under an obligation to pay.¹

Purchaser or mortgagee bound to inquire as to necessity.

A person lending money on the security of coparcenary property, or of the property of a minor, or buying that property, is bound to exercise due care and attention in seeing that there was a legal necessity for the loan,² and must satisfy himself as well as he can,³ and as an honest man,⁴ with reference to the parties with whom he is dealing, that the manager is acting in the particular instance for the benefit of the estate,⁵ and that circumstances of necessity had occurred which, under the Hindu law, would justify the sale of the property,⁶ or a charge upon it at the rate of interest arranged for in the particular instance.⁷

Current account.

In the case of a long series of borrowings it is not always possible to prove exactly the purpose for which any particular item was borrowed. "It will . . . be sufficient for the creditor to show that the family was in chronic need of money for the current outgoings of the family life or its trade necessities, and that the moneys were advanced on the representation of the manager that they were needed for such objects."⁸

Judgment debt.

Where the necessity arises from the pressure of a judgment debt, the person dealing with the manager is entitled to treat the judgment as prima facie proof of necessity.⁹

Where the manager is authorized by the Court to sell or pledge under secs. 28 or 29 of the Guardians and Wards Act,¹ or sec. 90 of the Probate and Administration Act,² or under the powers possessed by the High Courts, a bonâ fide purchaser or mortgagee need not investigate behind the order of authority.³

If the person dealing with the manager does make the above inquiries and acts honestly, the real existence of an alleged sufficient, and reasonably credited, necessity is not a condition precedent to the validity of his charge;⁴ and, under such circumstances, he is not bound to see to the application of the purchase-money.⁵

"It is obvious that money to be secured on any estate is likely to be obtained on easier terms than a loan which rests on mere personal security; and that, therefore, the mere creation of a charge securing a proper debt cannot be viewed as improvident management. The purposes for which a loan is wanted are often future as regards the actual application, and a lender can rarely have, unless he enters on the management, the means of controlling and rightly directing the actual application."⁶

This principle is to be found in sec. 38 of the Transfer of Property Act,¹ which is as follows:—

“Where any person, authorized only under circumstances in their nature variable to dispose of immovable property, transfers such property for consideration, alleging the existence of such circumstances, they shall, as between the transferee on the one part and the transferor and other persons (if any) affected by the transfer on the other part, be deemed to have existed, if the transferee, after using reasonable care to ascertain the existence of such circumstances, has acted in good faith.”

Illustration.

A, a Hindu widow, whose husband has left collateral heirs, alleging that the property held by her as such is insufficient for her maintenance, agrees, for purposes neither religious nor charitable, to sell a field, part of such property, to B. B satisfies himself by reasonable inquiry that the income of the property is insufficient for A's maintenance, and that the sale of the field is necessary, and, acting in good faith, buys the field from A. As between B on the one part and A and the collateral heirs on the other part, a necessity for the sale shall be deemed to have existed.

Nature of inquiry.

The existence of a necessity and of sufficient pressure on the estate is all that the lender need inquire about.² He need not inquire into its causes,³ or what is the exact amount required to be borrowed.⁴ Where the lender knows, or by ordinary diligence might have known, that there are funds available and sufficient for paying off the debt, the sale would be invalid.¹ He must be entirely on his guard. He must see whether the family with which he is dealing be divided or undivided; and if the latter, at his peril he must see that the transaction be one by which the coparceners will be concluded.²

The fact that the adult members support the manager in the transaction may justify the person advancing the money in giving additional credit to the representatives of the manager.³

Consent of adult coparceners.

Where the transaction has been unimpeached for some years, a purchaser from the original vendee would not be expected to make minute inquiries.⁴

Where it is sought to enforce or support a sale or mortgage by a manager, the purchaser or mortgagee must prove that the transaction was entered into in good faith;⁵ that he advanced in consideration of the sale or mortgage a sum of money which was reasonable with reference to the value of the property;⁶ that the money was raised or applied⁷ for the relief of a recognized necessity,⁸ or that proper inquiries were made by him with respect to the existence of a necessity justifying the sale, and that the result of such inquiries was such as to satisfy him as an honest man of the existence of such necessity.¹

In *Hunooman Persaud Panday's case*² their Lordships of the Privy Council said, "Next as to the consideration for the bond. The argument for the appellant in the reply, if correct, would indeed reduce the matter for consideration to a very short point; for, according to that argument, if the factum of a deed of charge by a manager for an infant be established, and the fact of the advance be proved, the presumption of law is primâ facie, to support the charge and the onus of disproving it rests on the heir. For this position a decision, or rather a dictum of the Sudder Dewany Adawlut at Agra in the case of Omed Rai v. Heeralall,³ was quoted and relied upon. But the dictum there, though general, must be read in connection with the facts of that case. It might be a correct course to adopt with reference to suits of that particular character, which was one where the sons of a living father were, with his suspected collusion, attempting, in a suit against a creditor, to get rid of the charge on an ancestral estate created by the father, on the ground of the alleged misconduct of the father in extravagant waste of the estate. Now, it is to be observed that a lender of money may reasonably be expected to prove the circumstances connected with his own particular loan, but cannot reasonably be expected to know, or to come prepared with proof, of the antecedent economy and good conduct of the owner of an ancestral estate; whilst the antecedents of their father's career would be more likely to be in the knowledge of the sons, members of the same family, than of a stranger; consequently, this dictum may perhaps be supported on the general principle that the allegation, and proof of facts, presumably in his better knowledge, is to be looked for from the party who possesses that better knowledge,⁴ as well as on the obvious ground in such suits of the danger of collusion between father and sons in fraud of the creditor of the former. But this case is of a description wholly different, and the dictum does not profess to be a general one, nor is it so to be regarded. Their Lordships think that the question on whom does the onus of proof lie in such suits as the present is one not capable of a general and inflexible answer. The presumption proper to be made will vary with circumstances, and must be regulated by, and dependent on, them.¹ Thus, where the mortgagee himself, with whom the transaction took place, is setting up a charge in his favour made by one, whose title to alienate he necessarily knew to be limited and qualified, he may be reasonably expected to allege and prove facts presumably better known to him than to the infant heir, namely, those facts which embody the representations made to him of the alleged needs of the estate, and the motives influencing his immediate loan."

The representations made by the manager at the time of the loan or alienation are evidence in favour of the person making the advance. Representations by manager.

In *Hunooman Persaud Panday's case*² the following will be found: "It is to be observed that the representations by the manager accompanying the loan as part of the res gestæ and as the contemporaneous declarations of an agent, though not actually selected by the principal, have been held to be evidence against the heir; and as their Lordships are informed that such primâ facie proof has been generally required in the Supreme Court of Calcutta between the lender and the heir; where the lender is enforcing his security against the heir, they think it reasonable and right that it should be required. A case in the time of Sir Edward Hyde East, reported in his decisions in the 2nd volume of Morley's "Digest," seems to be the foundation of this practice (see also the case of Brown v. Ram Kunnee Dutt).³ It is obvious, however, that it might be unreasonable to require such proof from one not an original party after a lapse of time and enjoyment, and apparent acquiescence; consequently, if, as is the case here as to part of the charge, it be created by substitution of a new security for an older one, when the consideration for the older one was an old precedent debt of an ancestor not previously questioned, a presumption of the kind contended for by the appellant would be reasonable."⁴ evidence of necessity;¹ but it may be some evidence of the representations made at the time.²

Adequacy of price.

In determining the question of the validity of a sale, adequacy of price is often an important point to be considered,³ though inadequacy of price is not necessarily conclusive proof of malâ fides.⁴ The mere fact that the manager or guardian might at the time of the sale have been able to make some more advantageous arrangement for the estate would not nullify a sale to a bonâ fide purchaser for value.⁵

Fraud.

Evidence of the bonâ fides of the transaction would of course be subject to be rebutted by evidence that the purchaser had acted malâ fide, or in collusion with the manager to the injury of the family.⁶ If there be any fraud in proceedings to enforce a charge, which was free from fraud, such proceedings may be set aside.⁷

Charge for a portion of advance.

When the purchaser or lender is unable to prove necessity for the raising of the whole of the money, or he is unable to prove that he was satisfied as to the necessity for the raising of the whole sum, he is entitled to a charge on the property for the amount which it was necessary to raise, or which after reasonable inquiries was shown to him to be necessary to raise.⁸ In any case he would be entitled to a charge for what is actually applied for the benefit of the family.¹

In the case of his obtaining such charge, a creditor, who has acted fairly, would ordinarily be entitled to interest at the contract rate.²

Where the interest is at a rate exceeding the rate at which the manager would have been able to borrow under the circumstances, the Court will reduce the interest to such lower rate, as the rate of interest is a question to which the lender ought to have applied his mind when inquiring as to the necessity.³

Foreclosure proceedings, or a purchase at a sale held under a decree in a suit on the mortgage, would not relieve a mortgagee from the burden of proving the bonâ fides of the transaction, or place him in any better position with regard to the family,⁴ although a bonâ fide purchaser without notice at a sale held in execution of a decree in a suit which was properly constituted might not be bound to inquire into the propriety of the loan which formed the basis of the decree.⁵

Burden of proof not altered by foreclosure proceedings on decree.

surviving coparcener.

When there are no existing coparceners, the surviving coparcener is, under the Mitakshara law, entitled to dispose of ancestral property as if it were his separate acquisition;³ but a gift by will will take no effect against a son who was in his mother's womb at the time of the death of his father.⁴

estate.

The holder of an impartible estate can, in the absence of a custom rendering it inalienable,⁵ dispose thereof by will or transfer inter vivos, whether he be governed by the Mitakshara⁶ or by the Bengal⁷ school of law.

A sale which took place at a time when the accepted interpretation of the law was that an impartible estate was inalienable was construed with reference to the law as it then stood.⁸

When the estate is inalienable, the holder can sell or charge it,⁹ in case of such a necessity as would justify the manager of an infant heir in a sale or charge.¹

Madras Acts II. of 1902, II. of 1903, and II. of 1904² have rendered the holders of a large number of impartible estates in the Madras Presidency incapable of alienating or binding by their debts the estate except under circumstances which would entitle the managing member of a joint Hindu family, not being the father or grandfather of the other coparceners, to make an alienation of the joint property, or incur a debt, binding on the shares of the other coparceners independently of their consent.

ALIENATION OF UNDIVIDED SHARE.

A Hindu governed by the Bengal school of Hindu law can deal with his undivided share of joint family property either by act inter vivos or by will, in the same way as he can deal with his separate property.³ On his death intestate his undivided share passes to his heir.

His share may be sold in execution of a decree.

The purchaser has been held entitled to be put into possession of the share bought by him,⁴ but not in such a way as to interfere with the family.

In one case⁵ when he applied for possession, a share was allotted to him in severalty. This had the same effect as if he had brought a partition suit.

According to the Mitakshara law, except where the debtor is the father, or paternal grandfather, of a coparcener, whose rights are enlarged by his death, a creditor of a coparcener, who has not obtained a judgment and has not attached the debtor's interest⁶ before the death of his debtor,¹ has no right to recover his debt from the coparcenary property.²

If it were otherwise the right of survivorship³ would be ineffectual.

Sale in execution.

He can obtain a sale of the undivided interest of his debtor in the property of the coparcenary in execution of a decree,⁴ if during the lifetime of the debtor there has been an attachment and order for sale.⁵

A provisional release from attachment does not affect his right.⁶

The purchaser at such sale is not entitled to sue for possession,⁷ but is entitled to ascertain his share by such partition as the judgment debtor might have compelled before the alienation of his share took place.⁸

If he has obtained possession he is not liable to be turned out, but the coparceners are entitled to joint possession with him.¹

The question whether a member of a joint family governed by the Mitakshara school of law can alienate or charge his interest in the coparcenary property, must be determined according to the Province in which the case arises. Alienation.

It is settled law in Madras² and Bombay³ that a purchaser for value⁴ acquires the interest of his vendor, that is a right to partition, and a right on partition to the share to which his vendor would have been entitled,⁵ but without partition he cannot acquire a right to any specific property⁶ or to a specific share. He is not entitled to possession,⁷ his right in that respect being the same as the right of a purchaser at a sale in execution of a decree.⁸

The Judicial Committee has recognized this to be the law applicable in Madras and Bombay.⁹

purchaser.

The purchaser becomes "a sort of tenant in common with the coparceners, admissible as such to his distributive share upon a partition taking place."¹

As the purchaser does not by the death of his vendor lose his right to a partition, so his position is not improved by the death of other coparceners before partition. He stands in no better position than his alienor, and, consequently, like the latter, is liable to have his share diminished before partition by the birth of other coparceners if he stands by and does not insist upon an immediate partition.²

As to the effect of a partition upon the rights of a purchaser or mortgagee of an undivided share, see post, p. 357.

Agreement not to sell.

An agreement in restraint of the alienation of an undivided share is valid,³ but it will not, it is submitted, bind a purchaser, at any rate where he has received no notice of the agreement.⁴ It does not affect a purchaser at a sale in execution of a decree.⁵

In Bengal⁶ and in the United Provinces⁷ a coparcener has no power to alienate by sale or mortgage his undivided share⁸ to a stranger or to a coparcener for his own benefit⁹ without the consent of his coparceners. This view has been accepted by the Judicial Committee.¹⁰

The alienation will not be set aside at the instance of the alienor or persons claiming through him except upon the terms of refunding the amount paid with interest.² Equity on setting aside alienation.

The power to dispose by gift or devise of his interest in coparcenary property in a case subject to the Mitakshara law is disallowed by all the High Courts.³ Gift or devise.

As a right of survivorship accrues to the other coparceners on the death of coparcener,⁴ it follows that there can be no right to dispose of any interest in the coparcenary property by will.⁵

As to the power of the last surviving coparcener, see ante, p. 296.

SETTING ASIDE ALIENATION.

who was born,¹ conceived,² or adopted³ at the time of the completion of the alienation,⁴ and is entitled to a share on partition.

A person disqualified from inheritance could not sue, although he might have a right of maintenance.⁵

It has been held that an invalid alienation made without the consent of existing sons can be set aside at the instance of a son who was not born at the time of the alienation,⁶ but it is clear that an alienation which by consent or otherwise is binding upon all the coparceners in existence at the time cannot be contested by a person who is born subsequently.⁷

person entitled to contest alienation.

In a family governed by the Mitakshara law a suit to set aside an alienation cannot on the death of the plaintiff be continued by his heir, as his right lapses.⁸ Under the Bengal school the right would pass to the heir.

The person entitled to contest an alienation may sue to set aside the alienation, or if it has not taken place may sue for an injunction.⁹ Where he cannot obtain substantive relief he can sue for a declaratory decree.¹⁰

is to be set aside.

In a case governed by the Bengal school of law a coparcener can sue to set aside an alienation, so far only as it affects his share of the coparcenary property.

Under the Mitakshara school, in the case of an invalid alienation in the Bombay or Madras Presidencies by a coparcener, the coparcener aggrieved may be entitled to have it set aside except so far as the share of the alienor is concerned,¹ whereas in Bengal or the United Provinces he is entitled to have the whole alienation set aside, subject to such equities as may be applicable.²

This distinction arises because a sale of an undivided interest is permissible in the two former Presidencies.³

A son is not entitled, during the father's lifetime, to eject the purchaser because the father sells without authority.⁴ He may bring a suit for partition, or may possibly, if he sues on behalf of the family, be entitled to a decree for possession⁵ on such terms as may be equitable, as, for instance, that the purchaser be entitled to a charge for the money paid by him,⁶ or be entitled to sue for partition.⁷

As to the right of the purchaser to compensation when he is ejected after the death of the father, see post, p. 304.

The consent of an adult coparcener or his acquiescence, at any rate where it amounts to an estoppel, prevents him from disputing an alienation made by a father or other manager.⁸ The ratification of the alienation by him will also have the same effect.⁹

Limitation of suit.

A suit brought by a Hindu governed by the law of the Mitakshara to set aside his father's alienation¹ of ancestral property must be brought within twelve years from the time when the alienee takes possession of the property.²

Compensation.

When the coparcener seeking to set aside the alienation, or the family has benefitted by the alienation, it may be equitable to compensate the purchaser or mortgagee.³

As to a sale or mortgage by the father, see post, p. 311.

The equity to pay compensation only arises when the sale or charge affects the interests of members of the family other than the alienor.⁴

Improvements.

Where the purchaser has, to the knowledge of those interested in setting aside the sale, and without their protest, laid out sums for the improvement or benefit of the property, they may be required to compensate him.⁵

The burden is upon the alienee to show that the money has been applied to family purposes; or that the person seeking to set aside the alienation has benefitted thereby.⁶

CHAPTER VIII.

THE DEBTS OF A FATHER UNDER THE MITAKSHARA LAW.

THE Hindu law imposes upon a son, and grandson, the duty of paying the debts of his father, and paternal grandfather,¹ provided that they have not been incurred for immoral or illegal purposes.²

Duty of son to pay debts of father.

Although, under the Mitakshara system of law, the father takes no greater interest than his son, grandson, or great-grandson when the family is undivided, the father can pay such debts out of the income of the family property,³ and can charge or sell the family property for that purpose.⁴ After his death his sons must pay his debts out of the coparcenary property. Moreover, a creditor can enforce the debt against the family property either during the lifetime of the debtor, or after his death.⁵

"By the Hindu law, the freedom of the son from the obligation to discharge the father's debt has respect to the nature of the debt, and not to the nature of the estate, whether ancestral or acquired by the creator of the debt."⁶

In a joint family governed by the Mitakshara school of law, a father can bind his sons, grandsons, and great-grandsons by a charge or alienation of the coparcenary estate, or of any portion thereof, for the purpose of paying his personal debts,¹ which he has incurred before the date of such charge or alienation,² provided that such debts have not been incurred for an illegal or immoral purpose or consideration.³

proof.

A creditor or alienee, claiming under such charge or alienation, would have to prove that the debt existed, or that after due inquiries he, in good faith, believed that it existed.⁴ The purchaser in execution of a decree need not prove any inquiry.⁵

The burden is then shifted upon the son to prove that the particular debt was contracted for an illegal or immoral purpose, and that the purchaser had notice, or upon reasonable inquiry might have discovered, that they were so contracted.¹

It is not sufficient for him to show that the father was of licentious or extravagant habits.²

"When ancestral property has passed out of the family either under a conveyance executed by the father in consideration of an antecedent debt, or in order to raise money to pay off an antecedent debt, or under a sale in execution of a decree for the latter's debt, his sons by reason of their duty to pay their father's debts cannot recover that property, unless they show that the debts were of a kind for which they would not have been liable, and that the purchasers had notice that they were so contracted . . . the purchasers at an execution sale, being strangers to the suit, if they have not notice that the debts were so contracted, are not bound to make inquiry beyond what appears on the surface of the proceedings."³

A son who was not born at the time that the debt was originally incurred⁴ cannot dispute a mortgage made to pay off the debt.⁵

Where the son is only able to prove that a portion of the debt was incurred for illegal or immoral purposes, the land would apparently stand charged for the remainder of the money.¹

What is an illegal or immoral purpose or consideration.

The exception is based upon certain texts which are to be found in Colebrooke's "Digest." Vrihaspati says,² "The sons are not compellable to pay sums due by their father for spirituous liquors, for losses at play, for promises made without any consideration, or under the influence of lust³ or of wrath; or sums for which he is a surety (except in the cases before mentioned⁴), or a fine, or a toll,⁵ or the balance of either." There are other similar texts.⁶

The exception as to sums for which the father is liable as surety applies apparently to cases of security for appearance, for keeping the peace, or for good behaviour.⁷ Where the father was surety for a debt, the liability of his son has been declared in several cases,⁸ but the liability of a grandson has been denied.⁹

Crime or fraud. If a criminal offence or fraud was the origin of the debt, the sons would not be obliged to recognize it; for instance, a decree for the value of property obtained by theft,¹⁰ a decree for money, or for the value of property misappropriated.¹¹ This would not apply to a case of money being merely wrongfully retained,¹² or to a decree for mesne profits obtained against the father by a person whom the latter wrongfully kept out of possession of immovable property.¹³

The son's liability extends also to the payment of interest,² the Interest. amount of interest being determinable by the law of the place. Where the rule of *damdapat*³ is not in force, that rule cannot be put in force.⁴

Such charge or alienation binds his sons⁵ and grandsons, whether they be minors or adults.

There is some authority that adult sons, who do not consent, would not be bound,⁶ but there is express authority to the contrary,⁷ and the many other decisions on the subject do not make this distinction. As the antecedent debt clearly binds the sons, the question whether they are bound by the mortgage or sale is not of great importance.⁸

This power which is given to the father cannot be exercised by any other member of the family even in the father's absence.⁹ Power limited to father.

It has been held that when the father is insolvent, the official assignee has the same power as the father.¹⁰

Except for the purpose of discharging such antecedent debt, or in case of a valid necessity,¹ a father has no power to alienate or charge the coparcenary property,² and the sale can be set aside.³

Mortgage for other debt.

Where a mortgage is given in respect of a debt not antecedent to the transaction,⁴ it can be treated as a secured debt against the father's interest,⁵ and, so far as the sons are concerned, it will be treated as an unsecured debt, and can be enforced against the sons by a suit, the decree in which can be executed against the coparcenary property (including the mortgaged property), but in that case it has been held that the limitation applicable to an unsecured debt would apply.⁶

So (except, perhaps, so far as questions of limitation are concerned, and except, perhaps, in cases where the property had been dealt with by the sons before suit) there is no difference between the remedy on a mortgage which is based on an antecedent debt and a mortgage given in consideration of a payment at the time.¹

In some of the older cases it was held that where the debt was not antecedent to the mortgage, the creditor had no rights against the coparcenary property except in case of necessity.²

Where there is a sale by the father, not on account of an antecedent debt, the sons cannot, unless the money was obtained for illegal or immoral purposes, set it aside without refunding the amount of the purchase-money, as the purchase-money would be a debt which they would be liable to pay.³

The question as to whether the mortgage or transfer passed the whole property, or only the father's interest therein, depends upon what the parties contracted about.⁴ This may be determined not only by the terms of the document, but also by the surrounding circumstances. The burden is upon the person claiming under the mortgage or sale.⁵

Question whether alienation passed property.

It is unsettled whether sons can be bound by a decree enforcing a mortgage on coparcenary property made by their father, and passed in a suit to which they are not parties.

Whether sons bound if not parties to suit.

The decisions in many suits instituted before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act,⁶ determined that sons who were joint with their father⁷ were so liable if the suit were brought against the father as representing himself and his sons.⁸

¹ See Chidambara Mudaliar v. Koothaperumal (1903), 27 Mad. 326, at p. 328. In this case it was said, "on principle it is difficult to make any distinction between a mortgage given for an antecedent debt and a mortgage given for a debt then incurred, for in either case the debt is binding upon the son and the enforcement of the security exonerates the son from the burden of the father's debt." In each case it was a question whether the decree was intended to bind the family, and whether in execution their interests passed by the sale.¹ It did not follow from the mere fact that the interest purporting to be sold was the right title and interest of the father that the entire interest which he had authority to deal with did not pass.²

If, however, the decree from the form of the suit, the character of the debt recovered by it and its terms was to be interpreted as a decree against the father alone and personal to himself, and all that was put up and sold thereunder in execution was his right and interest in the joint ancestral estate, then the auction purchaser acquired no more than that right and interest, i.e. the right to demand partition.³

Where the mortgage charged the whole interests, the form of mortgage decree now adopted by the Indian Courts would be sufficient to cause a sale of all of such interest.⁴

There is a difference of opinion as to whether the law as to who is bound by the decree has been altered by sec. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act.⁵ That section is as follows :—

must be joined as parties to any suit under this chapter relating to such mortgage: Provided that the plaintiff has notice of such interest."

The Bengal¹ and Allahabad High Courts² have held that where the plaintiff had notice of their existence,³ the sons can sue to set aside a decree to which they are not parties, but the latter Court has declined to extend this principle to a case where the property had been sold to a purchaser other than the decree holder.⁴ The result of this view of the section is that a new suit against the sons is necessary, and in such new suit the debt can be recovered by sale of the ancestral property.⁵ The Madras High Court considers that the law in this respect was not altered by the Transfer of Property Act.⁶ See Civil Procedure Code, 1908, Sched. I, Order XXXIV. r. 1.

such questions and of asserting such rights as they could have raised and asserted if they had been made parties.

They can thus get a right to redeem,¹ but if the property has been sold to a third person, the Allahabad High Court has held that a suit for redemption does not lie simply on the ground they have not been made parties.² A son born after a decree for sale would have no right of redemption.³

A son who was not joint with the father at the time of the suit would be entitled to redeem.⁴

Where the son has been a party to the suit he could not, of course, raise in another suit any question as to the validity of the mortgage or sale.

When the sons are not parties to the suit against their father, the creditor may institute another suit against them.⁵

creditor purchases, or, if a stranger purchases, and has notice of, or upon inquiry could have ascertained, the illegal or immoral character of the debt upon which the decree was based.¹

A decree for a mere money debt of the father,² not illegal or immoral, and whether incurred for family purposes or not, may be enforced in his lifetime by an execution sale of the entire coparcenary estate,³ and is binding on the sons, whether they were or were not parties to the suit.⁴ They are, however, entitled in case they were not parties to contest the binding nature of the debt in another suit,⁵ or by a claim under the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, Sched. I., Order XXI. r. 57.⁶

In two cases the Allahabad High Court¹ considered that where no sale had taken place, the sons could contest the decree on the sole ground that they were not parties to it, but in a latter case the same Court held that there is no ground for such distinction.²

in sale.

The son's rights do not pass when in contravention of sec. 99 of the Transfer of Property Act³ the mortgagee has attached the property in execution of a money decree,⁴ or the sale is otherwise irregular.

Execution of decree after
father.

Under the Civil Procedure Code of 1908 (s. 53) a creditor can, after the death of the father, execute the decree against coparcenary property in the hands of the sons. Where the property was attached in the father's lifetime he could proceed⁵; but where there was no such attachment, a new suit was necessary according to the High Courts of Madras and Allahabad, and according to some of the Bengal decisions.⁶ It was held in Bombay,⁷ and by the majority of a Full Bench in Bengal,⁸ that the decree could be executed against the sons.

The carrying out of a mortgage decree stands upon the same footing.⁹

If the coparcenary property has been charged by the decree, proceedings in execution can be taken against the sons after the death of the father.¹⁰ or only the father's undivided interest, depends upon the terms of the proceedings in execution. The Court will look at the substance of the proceedings to see what was intended to be sold, and what the purchaser could reasonably think he was buying.¹ It is a mixed question of law and fact.²

It is the duty of the judgment creditor to see that the orders of attachment and sale, or the sale certificate, clearly indicate the sale of all the interests in the property over which the judgment debtor had control.

There is some conflict as to whether there is any presumption that the whole interest passed,³ or whether there is a presumption that the interest of the father only passed.⁴ It is submitted that if there is any presumption one way or the other, it is upon the person supporting the sale.⁵

purchaser.

"The purchaser under the execution . . ." is "not bound to go further back than to see that there was a decree against" the father, "that the property was property liable to satisfy the decree, if the decree had been properly given against" him, "and having inquired into that, and having bonâ fide purchased the estate under the execution, and bonâ fide paid a valuable consideration for the property, the" sons "are not entitled to come in and to set aside all that has been done under the decree and execution, and recover back the estate from the" purchaser.¹

"If his debt was of a nature to support a sale of the entirety," the father "might legally have sold it without suit, or the creditor might legally procure a sale of it by suit. All the sons can claim is, that, not being parties to the sale or execution proceedings, they ought not to be barred from bringing the fact or the nature of the debt in a suit of their own. Assuming they have such a right, it will avail them nothing unless they can prove that the debt was not such as to justify the sale. If the expressions by which the estate is conveyed to the purchaser are susceptible of application either to the entirety or to the father's coparcenary interest alone, . . . the absence of the sons from the proceedings may be one material consideration. But if the fact be that the purchaser has bargained and paid for the entirety, he may clearly defend his title to it upon any ground which would have justified a sale if the sons had been brought in to oppose the execution proceedings."²

sons.

A decree may be obtained against the sons during the lifetime of their father so as to bind the coparcenary property, provided that the money was not raised for an illegal or immoral purpose.³

Personal liability of father.

Although the coparcenary property may not be liable, the father remains personally liable for a debt.

As to the sale of a share in the coparcenary property, see ante, pp. 297, 300.

The debts of a father, or paternal grandfather, even when not charged upon the estate, must be paid by the son, or grandson, out of the property of the coparcenary in which the debtor was a coparcener, provided such debts have not been incurred for an illegal or immoral purpose.¹

Simple contract debts of father.

The liability to pay a debt involves a liability to pay interest.²

Even during the lifetime of the father the son is liable to the extent of the coparcenary property, or of property of his father which comes into his hands; as, for instance, when the father has abandoned worldly affairs,³ or has been absent for a time which raises a presumption as to his death.⁴

Liability of son during father's lifetime.

The limitation for a suit against the son for a debt of his father is as provided by Article 120 of Schedule II. of the Limitation Act,⁵ i.e. six years from the time when the cause of action arose.⁶

Limitation of suit.

It has been held that the right of the creditor to sue the sons accrues during the father's lifetime, and that there is not a new cause of action on his death.⁷

Debt not a charge on property.

Effect of alienation.

A simple contract debt even of a father is not a charge upon the coparcenary property, or upon his separate property. When the son or heir has alienated the property, the creditor cannot claim his debt against the alienee, except where the alienation has been, to the knowledge of the alienee, made in order to avoid the debt, or with the intention of avoiding it. In case of such alienation, the remedy of the creditor is against the son or heir personally.¹

Remedy limited to assets.

The debts of the father cannot be recovered from the separate property of a son, even where such property has been the subject of a bonâ fide gift to the son by the father. They can only be recovered from the coparcenary property, or from property which was acquired by his sons on his death as his representatives.²

Liability after partition.

A creditor cannot enforce the payment of the debt of the father³ against property which has been allotted on partition to the son, unless the partition was effected for the purpose of avoiding the father's debts.⁴

Apart from the obligation of a son or grandson to pay Obligation to pay debts out of assets inherited, etc. the debts of his father or grandfather out of coparcenary property, the Hindu law, like other systems of law, requires the person who succeeds to the property of another as heir or devisee, to pay the debts of such other person to the extent of the assets received by him.² There is no obligation upon any other coparcener, who has acquired rights by survivorship, to pay the debts of the deceased coparcener.³

Debts can be recovered from the person who has wrongfully come into possession of the property of the deceased debtor.⁴

CHAPTER IX.

PARTITION.

What is partition.

PARTITION is the process by which the members of a joint family become separate, and cease to be coparceners.¹

Partition, according to the Mitakshara school, consists of the ascertainment of the shares of the coparceners, such shares not having existed before partition,² and the separation of such shares from one another.

According to the Dayabhaya school it consists only of the separation of the shares, such shares having previously existed.³

WHO IS ENTITLED TO PARTITION.

Who is entitled to partition.

"The ordinary rule is that if persons are entitled beneficially to shares in an estate, they may have a partition."⁴

to partition.

Except in Bombay⁶ an agreement not to partition coparcenary property binds the actual parties thereto,⁶ but it does not bind their representatives, or, unless there be an agreement not to assign, their assignees.⁷

A direction in a will prohibiting partition has no effect, as it is a Condition in condition repugnant to the gift.¹ Similarly, the owner of property will. cannot by mere contract during his life prevent his heirs from partitioning property after his death.²

Except in the case of a suit by a minor,³ the Court has no discretion to refuse partition.⁴ Each coparcener is at liberty to elect to separate from the joint family, but he cannot force a separation among the others against their will.⁵

Under the Bengal school of law, every adult coparcener, Bengal school. male or female,⁶ is entitled to enforce partition of the coparcenary property.

Except that there can be no partition directly between Mitakshara grandfather and grandson while the father is alive,⁷ or school. between great-grandfather and great-grandson when the father or grandfather is alive, every adult coparcener is, under the Mitakshara school of law, entitled to enforce partition.

“The property in the paternal or ancestral estate acquired by birth

Shib Sahai* (1883), 5 All. 430. Although the grandson may be unable to enforce partition he is a coparcener. Apparently if his interest be sold (see ante, pp. 297, 298), the purchaser could not enforce partition (see post, p. 328), and might have to run the risk of waiting until the death of the father before suing for partition.

under the Mitakshara law is . . . so connected with the right to a partition that it does not exist where there is no right to it."¹

great-grandson.

Under the Mitakshara law,² a son³ is entitled to partition of the coparcenary estate, whether movable or immovable,⁴ as against his father.⁵ On his father's death he is entitled to partition as against his father's father.⁶ On the death of his father and his father's father he has a similar right against his father's father's father.⁷

On the death of his father he represents his father's right to claim partition against his father's father.⁸

Even when his father and grandfather are both alive, a suit for partition may be brought by a coparcener, if they allow the property to be wasted and his interest to be imperilled.⁹

co-widow or sister,¹ and must be effected in such a way as not to prejudice the reversionary heirs.²

This case frequently occurs under the Bengal school of law. Under the Mitakshara school it could only occur with regard to the separate acquisitions of the husband or father, or in the case where the husband or father died without leaving any coparcener him surviving, or perhaps in a case where a share is allotted to wives on a partition.³

Where a widow or daughter is entitled to a partition a purchaser of her share is also entitled to partition.⁴

Where a Hindu widow is entitled to partition, and there is a reasonable apprehension that she will waste the movable property allotted to her share, sufficient provision should be made in the final decree for partition, for the prevention of such waste, to safeguard the interests of the reversioners.⁵

It has been held that in a suit for partition by a widow the Court has a discretion.⁶

Where a coparcener is a minor, and his interests are likely to be prejudiced by the property remaining joint, as, for instance, where his coparceners are wasting the property, or setting up rights adverse to him, or decline to provide for his maintenance, it is for his interest that a suit⁷ for a partition be brought,⁸ even against his father,⁹ but if there be no such special circumstances, it is ordinarily not in the interest of the minor that such suit should be brought.¹

The same principle would apply to reviving on behalf of a minor a suit for partition instituted by his father,² provided it be clear that the omission to continue the suit does not prejudice the minor's rights to the property.

It is not ordinarily in the interests of a minor member of a joint Hindu family, or of any other minor joint-owner, that his share should be separated. Primâ facie, a partition is not for a minor's benefit, because, ordinarily speaking, the family estate is better managed, and yields a greater ratio of profit in union than when split up and distributed among the several parceners, and moreover, by partition, a minor member of a Mitakshara family would lose the benefit of survivorship.³ There is also the danger of the minor's property being wasted by the costs of litigation.

Such special circumstances, as would render a suit for partition necessary in the interest of the minor, would justify a guardian in arranging a partition.⁴

Where an adult co-sharer insists upon partition the guardian cannot resist it, but must do his best in the interests of the minor.⁵

A partition by arbitration,⁶ or by arrangement,⁷ or by the Collector,⁸ is binding on a minor, and can be enforced by him,⁹ provided that he be not injuriously affected thereby, that it be fair, that he be duly represented,¹ and that the person representing him in such proceedings act bonâ fide and with a due regard to his interest.²

"There is no doubt that a valid agreement for partition may be made during the minority of one or more of the coparceners. That seems to follow from the admitted right of one coparcener to claim a partition, and if an agreement for partition could not be made binding on minors, a partition could hardly ever take place. No doubt, if the partition were unfair or prejudicial to the minor's interests, he might, on attaining his majority, by proper proceedings set it aside so far as regards himself."³

When a son is born to the father of a Mitakshara family, after there has been a partition between him and his sons, the afterborn son is not entitled to a redistribution, unless he was conceived at the time of the partition,⁴ but he is to the exclusion of his separated brethren entitled as a coparcener to the share allotted to his father, and to succeed as heir to his father.⁵

Effect of birth of son after partition.

It has been held that where the father has reserved no share for himself on the partition, an afterborn son is entitled to a share.⁶

In a case governed by the Bengal school, a posthumous son would be entitled to reopen a partition made by his brothers after his father's death and before his birth.⁷

coparceners.

As to the effect of a partition on the rights of coparceners who are absent, Sir Thomas Strange¹ says as follows: "Upon the same footing, in this respect, with minors are absentees, residing in a foreign country,² whose consent, at the time, not being attainable, partition may proceed without it, the law enjoining the preservation of their respective shares, till the one arrive at majority, and the other returns; and this is the case of the latter to the extent of the seventh in descent, the right of parceners remaining at home, being lost by dispossession beyond the fourth."³

This would, of course, be subject to the law for the limitation of suits.⁴

share.

The purchaser of the share of a coparcener, either at an execution sale⁵ or by a voluntary transfer, where such transfer is valid,⁶ has the same right of partition as the coparcener whose share was purchased by him, and is entitled to have a separate portion allotted to him,⁷ but he may be compelled to sell to a coparcener a share of a dwelling-house purchased by him.⁸

A transferee, either by a private sale, or by a sale in execution of a decree, of the interest of a coparcener, in a portion only of the family property, is not entitled, as of right, to partition of such portion only.¹ Should he sue for a partition of such portion only, a coparcener may require him to include the whole of the family property in the suit,² but is not obliged to insist upon it.³

It has been said that in a case governed by the law of the Daya-bhaga such partial partition can be claimed,⁴ but it is submitted that no such distinction can be drawn.

RIGHTS OF WIFE AND WIDOW.

Under the Mitakshara school of law, except in Southern India, on a partition of coparcenary property by a father and his son or sons (or purchasers of their shares⁵), the wife of the father is entitled to have allotted to her for her separate enjoyment a share equal to a son's share,⁶ in order to provide for her maintenance.⁷

Mr. Mayne¹ states that in Southern India the practice of allotting shares to wives is obsolete. Having regard to old authorities of the Dravida school it was not settled whether the father retained for them the shares which are assigned to his wives, or whether, as in the case of the Benares, Bombay, and Mithila schools, the shares should be made over to the wives themselves.²

Bengal school. As under the law of the Bengal school a father is entitled to the absolute disposal of his property, whether ancestral or self-acquired,³ this question cannot arise. In the rare case of a father partitioning his property amongst his sons, it is said that "his sonless wives are each entitled to a share equal to that of a son, or to half⁴ of such share, according as they are unprovided, or provided, with stridhana."⁵

If the wife has previously had separate property given to her by her husband or father-in-law, she takes so much as with such separate property would amount to a share equal to that of one of the sons.⁶

Mother's share on partition.

Except in Southern India, where, it is said, the practice is obsolete,⁷ a widow is, on a partition of coparcenary property⁸ between her sons, or between her sons and grandsons⁹ (or purchasers of their shares¹⁰), entitled to a share equal to that of one of her sons in lieu of maintenance.¹¹

In Madras a mother is, according to the "Smriti Chandrika," entitled on partition between her sons to have allotted to her a portion sufficient for her maintenance, but not exceeding the share of one of her sons.¹

Except under the Bengal school,² a sonless widow is entitled to a share on a partition between her stepsons,³ but even in Bengal she is entitled to a share on a partition between her sons and stepsons.⁴

In a partition between sons by different wives the respective mothers are only entitled to share equally with their own sons the aggregate of the shares which an equal division among the brothers allots to those sons, or, in other words, the property must be first divided into as many shares as there are sons. Each widow then shares equally with each of her sons the portion allotted to her sons.⁵

In a Bombay case⁶ where there was a partition between a son and his stepmother and her three sons, the stepmother was given one-fifth. According to the above rule, she would have been entitled to a three-sixteenth share.

This right of the mother has been held only to apply to the case of a general partition, and not to a case where there has been only a partition of an item of the property at the instance of a stranger.¹

It has also been held that this right only comes into operation when the partition is completed.²

Under the Bengal law a husband can by will deprive his wife of a share on partition.³

Right of grandmother.

On a partition between her son's sons, a widow is entitled to a share equal to that of a son's son.⁴

On a partition between son's sons and great-grandsons, she is entitled to the share of a son's son.⁵

When the partition is between grandsons by different sons, the share of the grandmother is to be ascertained by giving her such a share as she would take if each of the grandsons took equally. Thus if there be nine grandsons she will get one-tenth, and so on. The share which the grandsons themselves take depends upon the number in each stock, and upon whether their own mothers are alive.

Great-grandmother.

The right of a widow to a share on a partition between her great-grandsons is not expressly recognized by the Hindu law.⁶ The right would, it is submitted, be admissible upon grounds similar to those which confer a right upon a mother and grandmother.⁷

In fixing the amount of her share, the widow must be debited with the value of any gift or legacy which she may have received from her husband.¹ Gift by husband.

Apparently, as in the case of allotting maintenance, her separate property must be taken into account,² but the fact that she has inherited a share from one of her sons does not deprive her of her right to a share on partition.³

According to the Mitakshara, the share becomes the absolute property of the widow to whom it is allotted,⁴ but, according to the Bengal school, on the death of the widow the share goes back to the sons or grandsons from whose shares it was deducted,⁵ and she has no power to dispose of it by will.⁶ Rights in share.

Although a right to maintenance is not a complete charge upon the property,⁷ a right to a share in lieu of maintenance is not affected by a sale of an undivided share, whether before⁸ or during the pendency of a partition suit.⁹ Effect of sale on right.

It has been held that the loss of a right of maintenance would involve the loss of the right to a share on partition.¹⁰ It is, it is submitted, clear that when the share had been allotted, want of chastity would not divest the right.¹¹ of right.

A wife or widow cannot, until there has been a partition or separation, enforce her right to a share,¹ even if by arrangement a share of the profits has been assigned to her for her maintenance,² and until partition she has no alienable interest.³ When there has been a partition, or a separation, she may sue for her share.⁴ She is a necessary party to a suit by a son against her husband,⁵ or to a suit between her sons, for partition; but the omission to reserve a share for the mother does not render the partition invalid.⁶ She may acquiesce in such omission.⁷

on partition.

A woman, who is not a coparcener, is not entitled to a share except on such partition as is above mentioned.⁸

Sister.

Although some of the ancient writers gave her the right to a one-fourth share,⁹ a sister is not entitled to a share on a partition.¹⁰ As she is entitled to her maintenance until marriage, and to her marriage expenses out of the family property,¹¹ provision therefor should be made at the time of the partition.

ALLOTMENT OF SHARES.

Shares on
partition.

On a partition shares are allotted in accordance with the following rules. There is nothing in law to prevent an arrangement upon a different footing,¹² so far as the interest of adult coparceners are concerned, but an arrangement between the parties to a partition that the shares should be inalienable, and should revert to the original coparceners, cannot be upheld.¹

Under the Mitakshara school of law, in a partition Between father and sons. between a father and his sons, each of the sons take a share equal to that of the father.²

Although under the Mitakshara a father is entitled to dispose of his self-acquired property,³ and under the Unequal division by father. Bengal school he is entitled to dispose of all his property, whether ancestral or self-acquired, it does not seem settled upon the authorities whether in the former case he can divide his self-acquired property, or in the latter case any of his property in unequal shares between his sons.⁴

Some of the text writers⁵ prohibited such inequality of division, except under special circumstances.

Mr. Mayne⁶ sums up the authorities in the following words: "The result would be that a father under Mitakshara law, in dealing with his self-acquired property, or any other property in which his sons take no interest by birth, and a father under Bengal law, in dealing with any property, may distribute it as he likes. If he conforms to the rules of partition, the transaction will be valid by mutual agreement, without actual apportionment followed by possession; but if he does not conform to those rules, then he must deliver the share to each of the sharers, so as to make a valid gift to each."

As to the Bengal school, Dr. Jogendra Nath Bhattacharya⁷ said: "As the father can undoubtedly make a gift of ancestral property, even in favour of a stranger, there can be no doubt that the father can make an unequal partition of such property among his sons, though by doing so against the rules of the Shastras he incurs sin;" and R. C. Mitra⁸ says: "It has been held that the injunctions against an unequal distribution by the father are mere moral precepts which no Court of law would enforce. A father bent upon making an unequal distribution may do so in more ways than one."

Between
their sons, etc.

According to all the schools, on a partition brothers take equal shares.¹

Shares of deceased brothers.

Under the Mitakshara school, the share of a brother who has died is represented by his sons, grandsons, and great-grandsons.

Under the Bengal school, the share of a brother, who is dead, is taken by his heir,² devisee, or assignee.

Different branches.

As between different branches of a family, division must be per stirpes, i.e. according to the stock,³ and as between the sons of the same father, it must be per capita.⁴

This rule "is designed to ensure equality of partition in cases of vested interests held in coparcenary, and to carry out in those cases the principles that those who have capacity to confer equal spiritual benefits on the common ancestor ought to take equal shares."⁵

The family having descended from two brothers, one half-share must be allotted to each branch. As to B's branch, D and his sons, D₁, D₂, and D₃, are each entitled to $\frac{1}{4}$ of $\frac{1}{2}$, i.e. $\frac{1}{8}$. As to C's branch, each of the sub-branches composed of C's sons, E, F, and G, with their sons respectively, will be entitled to $\frac{1}{3}$ of $\frac{1}{2}$, i.e. $\frac{1}{6}$, so E and E₁ will each get $\frac{1}{2}$ of $\frac{1}{6}$, i.e. $\frac{1}{12}$, F, F₁, and F₂ will each get $\frac{1}{3}$ of $\frac{1}{6}$, i.e. $\frac{1}{18}$, G, G₁, G₂, G₃, and G₄ will each get $\frac{1}{6}$ of $\frac{1}{6}$, i.e. $\frac{1}{36}$. This illustration will apply to the Bengal school, except that under that school the sons do not take during the lifetime of their fathers.

This rule is laid down with reference to cases in which all the coparceners desire partition at the same time. Where there is a partition by some only of the coparceners, and subsequently there is a partition between the coparceners who had remained united after the first partition, the allotment of shares of the second partition must have regard to the state of the family before the first partition, with such variations as may have arisen in consequence of the death of coparceners or the birth of new coparceners.¹

Sons by different mothers.

When daughter's sons,³ or *gotraja sapindas*⁴ other than descendants, succeed as heirs, they take on partition per capita.

SUBJECT OF PARTITION.

The coparcenary property,⁵ movable or immovable, is alone the subject of partition.

Subject of partition.

Partition cannot be made of property which has been proved to have, by ancient and invariable custom,⁶ always descended to one member, and to have been enjoyed by him alone, and not to have been divided.⁷

The following are instances where the custom of impartibility is to be found:—

Raj. (a) Zemindaries, especially in the Madras Presidency, partaking of the nature of a Raj or sovereignty.¹

Palayam. (b) Palayams (tracts of country governed by a Poligar or petty chieftain as a principality or Raj)² in the Madras Presidency.³

An estate which is neither a Raj nor a Palayam may also by family custom be impartible.⁴

Grants by Government. (c) Saranjams⁵ or Jaghirs.⁶ Although Saranjams are primâ facie impartible, they may be originally partible, or become so by family usage.⁷

Grants by Government, at any rate in the Southern Mahratta country, in the absence of any provision in the grant, or any custom would follow the ordinary rule of ancestral property,⁸ especially where they are granted for the maintenance of the family.⁹

On partition, however, the right of the officer to allowances for the performance of the duties of his office must be reserved.³

A mere arrangement for the convenient performance of the services of the officer is on a different footing from a custom.⁴

Where the services have been abolished, a family custom might still render the property impartible.⁵

The terms of the grant might, of course, create impartibility.⁶

The office of Pattam, an office of dignity in a family governed by Pattam, the Aliya Satana law, is impartible.⁷

Impartible property which has been sold¹ does not retain its character of impartibility.

Allotment to one of coparceners.

When impartible property forms part of joint family property, it may, on a partition, be allotted to one of the coparceners, corresponding property being allotted to the others.² When it is excluded from the partition, the members of the family retain their rights with regard to it.³

Discontinuance of custom.

Except where the property is held under a grant which precludes partibility, there seems no reason why the family may not discontinue the custom of impartibility,⁴ and make it subject to partition.⁵

All property to be divided.

A coparcener is entitled to insist that all the family property, except what is impartible, as above, shall be divided.

Leaseholds.

Leasehold property, including property held on a lease from Government, can be partitioned.⁶

Land in occupation of tenants.

Land in the possession of tenants can be partitioned,⁷ either by metes and bounds, or by a division of the rent.

Family dwelling-house.

A coparcener⁸ or purchaser⁹ is entitled to insist that the family dwelling-house be partitioned; but a purchaser may be required to sell his share therein to a coparcener.¹⁰

He has a similar right with regard to a compound hitherto held in common, and such right is not affected by the fact that there is a public right of way over such compound.¹¹

"The principle . . . of partition is that if a property can be partitioned without destroying the intrinsic value of the whole property, or of the shares, such partition ought to be made. If, on the contrary, no partition can be made without destroying the intrinsic value, then a money compensation should be given instead of the share which would fall to 'a coparcener' by partition."¹

Where property is in its nature indivisible, as, for instance, in the case of animals, furniture, etc., it can be allotted to individual coparceners, corresponding or equivalent parcels of the property being allotted to other coparceners, or the value being made up in money.

Where it is impossible or inequitable to allot a specific item to an individual, as where it consists of a right of way, a passage, a well, a bridge, it may be necessary that the item of property should continue to be jointly enjoyed by the several coparceners.

In some cases it may be necessary to sell the property and adjust the proceeds in the distribution.²

Places of worship and sacrifice,³ and property dedicated to an idol or to other pious uses, cannot be physically partitioned.⁴

In one case,⁵ where there were two idols belonging to the family, an arrangement by which one of the heirs took one of the idols and the property endowed for the worship thereof, and the other took the other idol and property, was approved by the Court.

Where merely a charge is treated for religious purposes, the property can be alienated or partitioned subject to the charge.⁶

Places of worship, etc.

Apart from a dedication, the use to which property has been put, as, for instance, when it has been used as a poojah dalan, does not render it impartible, but the Court may, if the circumstances make it equitable, permit that portion to be allotted to a single sharer, and require him to pay owelty of partition, or to account for its value in the partition.¹

Mode of allotment.

Where there is a family idol, or temple, or religious endowment belonging to the coparcenary, it is usual to allot to each of the coparceners an alternate recurring period of worship or holding in proportion to their shares.²

In a Bombay case,³ the High Court on a partition gave the custody of the family idol and of the property appertaining thereto to the senior member of the family, reserving to the other members a right of access; but in Bengal it is the practice to provide for the worship and custody in "palas" or turns.⁴ It is submitted that the latter practice is the right one.

A turn of worship is not alienable,⁵ except perhaps to other persons entitled to turns, or to members of the family.

HOW SEPARATION AND PARTITION CAN BE EFFECTED.

Under the Mitakshara school of law, a father can effect a partition between his sons with or without their consent.¹

Apart from the special powers given to a father by the Mitakshara law, the union of the coparceners in a joint family can be dissolved by any arrangement, express or implied, by which the coparceners alter, or intend to alter, their title as coparceners into a title either as tenants in common or as owners of separate shares, or by any change in the status of the coparceners, which is inconsistent with their being members of a joint family.²

Separation how effected.

Apart from the special powers given to a father by the Mitakshara law, a partition can be effected either by an arrangement between the coparceners, or by a decree of a competent Court,³ or by the Revenue authorities.⁴

All the coparceners should be parties to a partition by arrangement,⁵ the guardians of minor coparceners acting on their behalf.⁶

In the case of a partition by arrangement,⁷ the partition may be partial as regards the persons separating, some of the coparceners electing to remain joint, their status inter se being unaffected by the separation.⁸

Partial partition.

Coparceners may also by agreement arrange that a portion only of the property should be divided, the remainder remaining joint.¹ They can afterwards partition the remainder of the property.²

"Though there can be no compulsory partial partition either in respect of the joint property belonging to the family, or in respect of the persons constituting the undivided family,³ yet by mutual agreement of parties the partition can be partial either in respect of the property⁴ or of the persons constituting the family. And according to usage and custom the remaining members of an undivided family from which one or more alone have become divided, continue as an undivided family in its normal state and not as members, who after partition have been reunited."⁵

Actual
partition
unnecessary.

A separation in estate and interest can be effected, although there be no partition by metes and bounds.⁶

There may be a separation of the members of the family and at the same time an arrangement for the sake of convenience that the property should remain joint, but be held in defined shares. In that case the rights of the separating coparceners inter se are those of ordinary tenants in common, and are free from the incidents applicable to a joint family.⁷

There would, in the absence of a valid agreement,¹ be a right to enforce a partition of such property subsequently.²

A partition can be effected without an instrument in writing.³

"The true test of partition of property, according to Hindu law, is the intention of the family to become separate owners."⁴

Question is one of intention.

The question is one of intention merely, viz. whether the intention of the parties, to be inferred from the instruments which they had executed and the acts they had done, was to effect a division such as to alter the status of the family.⁵

An agreement between the coparceners to hold and enjoy the property in severalty operates as a separation in estate, although there may have been no actual partition by metes and bounds,⁶ and although the separate possession and enjoyment be postponed until the agreement be fully carried into effect.⁷

"When the members of an undivided family agree among themselves with regard to particular property, that it shall thenceforth be the subject of ownership, in certain defined shares,¹ then the character of undivided property and joint enjoyment is taken away from the subject-matter so agreed to be dealt with; and in the estate each member has thenceforth a definite and certain share, which he may claim the right to receive and to enjoy in severalty, although the property itself has not been actually severed and divided."²

An arrangement by which property was allotted to a younger brother for his maintenance does not make an impartible zemindary the separate property of the elder brother.³

The legal construction of the agreement cannot be controlled or altered by the subsequent conduct of the parties,⁴ except where there has been in law a valid reunion.⁵

ment to divide.

It has been held that where there is no indication of an intention to presently appropriate and enjoy in a manner inconsistent with the ordinary state of enjoyment of an undivided family, an agreement to divide without more is of itself insufficient to effect a separation.⁶

petitions, etc.

The fact that in documents executed by the coparceners, such as petitions to the Revenue or other authorities, or under the Land Registration Act,⁷ there is a definition of an interest in the joint estate, in terms of a fraction of the whole, without any indication of an intention to divide interests and liabilities, is insufficient to constitute a legal dissolution of a joint family, although it is evidence of a separation.¹ Separation may be inferred from definement of shares, followed by entries of separate interests in the Revenue records.²

When a cosharer sells his rights in the family property to another coparcener, such sale amounts to a separation, so far as the vendor is concerned.³ Sale of share.

There is considerable authority that an unequivocal act or declaration by a coparcener, showing his intention to hold his share separately, effects a partition;⁴ but if this be so, the mere filing of a suit for partition⁵ would operate to effect a separation, whereas the authorities⁶ only contemplate separation being effected by a decree in such suit, and moreover the expressions used in Appovier's Case,⁷ and the cases following it, seem, it is submitted, to show that there must be an agreement.⁸ Such signification of intention might perhaps, if not repudiated, be taken to imply an agreement. Act or declaration by one coparcener.

A loss by a cosharer of his rights by operation of the law of limitation amounts to a separation of that cosharer, so far as the family property is concerned.⁹ Loss of share by limitation.

Separation may be proved by acts which show such agreement and intention, such as cesser of commensality,¹ separate occupation of portions of the property,² separate enjoyment of distinct shares of the profits,³ separate definement of shares in the Revenue records,⁴ agreement to divide the proceeds in definite shares,⁵ or other acts which are inconsistent with the family remaining joint, such as separate transactions between themselves or with others.⁶

of portions of the property,¹ or separate collection of rents,² or separate dealings,³ are not conclusive, unless there is an intention to separate. They are all evidence of separation, and may lead to the inference that there was a separation.⁴

The fact that a man availed himself of his near agnatic relations in the administration of his property at the same time that he gave them maintenance and paid the expenses of their marriage and other ceremonies is not inconsistent with his position as a separated member.⁵

Conversion to Mahomedanism,⁶ or to Christianity,⁷ ipso facto separates the convert from the coparcenary.

Decree for partition.

A decree for partition is on the same footing as an agreement for partition.⁸

A decree directing partition,⁹ or a decree giving effect to a suit, which, though not in terms seeking a partition, indicates a distinct intention of obtaining a separation in estate, or an award by arbitrators,¹⁰ operates as a separation.¹¹

Decree.

The fact that the decree postpones the vesting of the share does not make any difference.¹²

The mere determination of the shares by a preliminary decree is not tantamount to partition: Jogendra Nath Roy v. Baladeb Das Marwari (1907), 12 C. W. N. 127, at p. 129; but it may effect a separation.

¹² Lakshman Darku v. Narayan Lakshman (1899), 24 Bom. 182.

It has been held that the decree does not create a severance pending an appeal,¹ but if pending the appeal the parties treat the decree as creating a severance it has such effect.²

Where, in a suit for general partition of a family estate, the plaintiff succeeded with regard only to a small portion thereof, it was held that the family did not in consequence of these proceedings become a divided one.³

In a case under the Bengal school of law, where the parties disregarded the decree, and continued to live as a joint family, it was held that there was no separation.⁴

of share.

An order for sale of a share of family property in execution of decree would not create a separation.⁵

"The disruption of a joint family cannot be effected by an order of Court against the intention of the parties, unless it be followed by an actual conversion of the joint tenancy into a tenancy in common, or an actual partition by metes and bounds."⁶

Suit for
partition.

A suit for partition may be brought by a person who is entitled to partition.⁷

Limitation.

A suit for partition is barred when twelve years has expired from the time when exclusion of the plaintiff from the coparcenary property becomes known to him.⁸

suits.

All persons entitled to a share on partition, including the wife, mother, or grandmother, and purchasers of undivided shares⁹ or mortgagees,¹⁰ should be parties to a suit for partition.¹¹

A suit for partition must include all the property which is partible¹ and available for partition at the time,² and is within the limits of the jurisdiction of the Court in which the suit is brought.³ Property in suit.

There is authority that when the suit does not include all the coparcenary property the suit should be dismissed,⁴ but it is submitted that where the objection is raised, the proper course is to permit the plaintiff to amend his plaint so as to include the whole property.⁵

In a suit filed in the ordinary original jurisdiction of the High Courts there is no difficulty in including other property after an interlocutory decree for partition.

A defendant may insist that joint property which is not mentioned in the plaint be brought into the partition,⁶ whether it be or be not within the jurisdiction of the Court in which the suit is brought,⁷ but he cannot require the plaintiff to bring into the partition land which is outside British India.⁸

Where no objection is raised by the parties there seems Partial partition.

to be no reason why a partial partition should not be effected even in a suit.¹

Property within different jurisdictions.

When the coparcenary property is situate within the jurisdiction of more than one Court, suits can be brought in the several Courts having jurisdiction.²

When there is property of the family held jointly by the whole family with strangers, a separate suit should be brought for partition of such property,³ except where they have bought the interests of coparceners in the coparcenary property.

A separate suit will lie with regard to property which belongs to some of the coparceners only.⁴

share.

It has been held in Bombay⁵ and Allahabad⁶ that a purchaser of a share of one of the coparceners in a portion of the coparcenary property is entitled to bring a suit for partition of that portion only, but that any coparcener may require his share in the whole of the coparcenary property to be ascertained and partitioned in such suit.

In Madras the purchaser is required to bring a suit for general partition,⁷ and apparently the same view would be taken in Calcutta.⁸

A coparcener is entitled to bring against such purchaser a partition suit limited to the property so purchased.⁹

Where a portion of the family property has passed entirely into the hands of strangers, there is no reason why the right thereto should not be determined without reference to the remaining property of the family.¹

In the case of a decree for partition and of a partition by arrangement, it is necessary to ascertain the amount of the coparcenary property, and what is available for partition. Inquiry as to property.

The presumption is that, "in the absence of evidence, the property for partition is such as exists at the time of the suit for partition."²

An inquiry as to what the coparcenary property consists of generally involves an account of the rents and profits which have been received by the manager.³ Credit must be allowed to him for all expenditure properly made out of the purse of the coparcenary.⁴

As to the nature of the account which the manager is required to furnish, see ante, pp. 273, 274.

Where one member of the family has been entirely excluded from the enjoyment of the property, he would be entitled to an account of the mesne profits on an ordinary footing.⁵ Account of mesne profits.

An account of mesne profits is also allowed when an arrangement for the enjoyment of the property in specific and definite shares has been disturbed.⁶

In the absence of an express agreement a coparcener is not entitled to credit for sums laid out by him in the improvement or upkeep of the coparcenary property.⁷ Improvements.

Provision must first be made for all debts due by the family as such,⁸ including debts due by the father of separating brothers,⁹ and also for all proper charges upon Provision for debts, etc.

the family property for maintenance,¹ the marriages of dependent female members,² the expenses of whose marriages is not payable out of individual shares, and such religious ceremonies as are payable by the whole family,³ and cannot be adjusted so as to be paid out of individual shares.

Each member of the coparcenary is obliged to bring into hotchpot, and submit to partition any coparcenary property, or property acquired from coparcenary funds which may be in his hands.⁴

He is not required to account for money which has been received by him for his expenses.⁵

Where a single coparcener has purported to deal with a defined portion of the family property as if it were his own, it may be equitable to allot such portion to the purchaser if possible.⁶ Where he has dealt with a share in a defined portion, it may be equitable on partition to allot him a share in such portion. If such course be not equitable or practicable, the alienor would only have a right of compensation against the alienor personally.⁷

Where a coparcener has, by arrangement or without objection, occupied a particular portion of the family property, or where he has laid out his separate money on a certain portion of the property, it may be equitable to allot to him the portion occupied, or improved by him, provided that he does not thereby get more than his share.

In one case,¹ where a coparcener built with his separate money a house upon ground belonging to the family, the Court held that each of the coparceners was entitled to a share in the house and the site upon which it was built, equal in value to his share of the site.

When the property is partible and capable of partition, the Court will ordinarily order a partition by metes and bounds. How partition made by Court.

The following provisions of the Partition Act, 1893,² apply to all partitions by the Court, but do not affect any local law providing for the partition of immovable property paying revenue to Government. Partition Act, 1893.

Sec. 2. Whenever in any suit for partition in which, if instituted prior to the commencement of this Act, a decree for partition might have been made, it appears to the Court that, by reason of the nature of the property to which the suit relates, or of the number of the shareholders therein, or of any other special circumstance, a division of the property cannot reasonably or conveniently be made, and that a sale of the property and distribution of the proceeds would be more beneficial for all the shareholders, the Court may, if it thinks fit, on the request of any of such shareholders interested individually or collectively to the extent of one moiety or upwards, direct a sale of the property and a distribution of the proceeds.³ Power to Court to order sale instead of division in partition suits.

Sec. 3. (1) If, in any case in which the Court is requested under the last foregoing section to direct a sale, any other shareholder applies for leave to buy at a valuation the share or shares of the party or parties asking for a sale, the Court shall order a valuation of the share or shares in such manner as it may think fit and offer to sell the same to such shareholder at the price so ascertained, and may give all necessary and proper directions in that behalf. Procedure when sharer undertakes to buy.

(2) If two or more shareholders severally apply for leave to buy as provided in sub-section (1), the Court shall order a sale of the share or shares to the shareholder who offers to pay the highest price above the valuation made by the Court.

(3) If no such shareholder is willing to buy such share or shares at the price so ascertained, the applicant or applicants shall be liable to pay all costs of or incident to the application or applications.

Sec. 4. (1) Where a share of a dwelling-house belonging to an undivided family⁴ has been transferred to a person who is not a member of such family and such transferee sues for partition, the Court shall, if any member of the family being a shareholder shall undertake to buy the share of such transferee, make a valuation of such share in such manner as it thinks fit and direct the sale of such share to such Partition suit by transferee of share in dwelling-house.

(2) If in any case described in sub-section (1) two or more members of the family being such shareholders severally undertake to buy such share, the Court shall follow the procedure prescribed by sub-section (2) of the last foregoing section.

Representation
disability.

5. In any suit for partition a request for sale may be made or an undertaking, or application for leave, to buy may be given or made on behalf of any party under disability by any person authorized to act on behalf of such party in such suit, but the Court shall not be bound to comply with any such request, undertaking or application unless it is of opinion that the sale or purchase will be for the benefit of the party under such disability.

Reserved bidding and bidding by shareholders.

6. (1) Every sale under section 2 shall be subject to a reserved bidding, and the amount of such bidding shall be fixed by the Court in such manner as it may think fit and may be varied from time to time.

(2) On any such sale any of the shareholders shall be at liberty to bid at the sale on such terms as to non-payment of deposit or as to setting off or accounting for the purchase-money or any part thereof instead of paying the same as to the Court may seem reasonable.

(3) If two or more persons, of whom one is a shareholder in the property, respectively advance the same sum at any bidding at such sale, such bidding shall be deemed to be the bidding of the shareholder.

Procedure to
case of sales.

7. Save as hereinbefore provided, when any property is directed to be sold under this Act, the following procedure shall, as far as practicable, be adopted, namely:—

(a) if the property be sold under a decree or order of the High Court of Calcutta, Madras or Bombay in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, or of the Court of the Recorder of Rangoon,¹ the procedure of such Court in its original civil jurisdiction for the sale of property by the Registrar;

(b) if the property be sold under a decree or order of any other Court, such procedure as the High Court may from time to time by rules prescribe in this behalf, and until such rules are made the procedure prescribed in the Code of Civil Procedure² in respect of sales in execution of decrees.

8. Any order for sale made by the Court under section 2, 3, or 4 shall be deemed to be a decree within the meaning of section 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Saving of
partly partition and partly sale.

9. In any suit for partition the Court may, if it shall think fit, make a decree for a partition of part of the property to which the suit relates and a sale of the remainder under this Act.

² Act XIV. of 1882.

10. This Act shall apply to suits instituted before the commencement thereof, in which no scheme for the partition of the property has been finally approved by the Court. Application of Act to pending suits.

A Civil Court can make a decree for a partition of an estate paying revenue to Government, but cannot carry out its decree.¹ If the decree be for the partition, or for the separate possession of a share of an undivided estate assessed as such to the payment of undivided revenue to Government,² the partition of the estate or the separation of the share shall be made by the Collector according to the law, if any, for the time being in force for the partition, or the separate possession of such estate.³ Partition of revenue-paying estate.

The Civil Court may carry out the decree if no separate allotment of the revenue be asked for.⁴

Where a coparcener has mortgaged or sold his undivided share of coparcenary property, and the property has on partition been allotted to another member, the mortgagee or purchaser is entitled to a charge upon other property allotted on the partition to the person dealing with him.⁵ Mortgage of undivided share.

Where, from accident, mistake, or fraud, a portion of the coparcenary property is not included in a partition, such portion must be divided amongst the persons who took under the partition.⁶ The subsequent discovery will not justify an interference with the original partition.⁷ Accident, mistake, fraud.

except perhaps where by concealment one of the parties has obtained some special advantage in the original partition.¹

Where, after the partition, it appears that property allotted to one of the coparceners did not belong to the coparcenary,² or that a valid charge existed thereon,³ the coparcener to whom such property was allotted can insist upon the partition being reopened, or, at any rate, can claim compensation from the other parties to the partition.

family, and to remit them to the same status as before the partition.

There must be a complete junction of estate, and not a mere living together,¹ or joint enjoyment of the property.²

Where any of their descendants think fit to unite, they may do so; but such a union is not a reunion in the sense of the Hindu law, and does not affect the inheritance.³

According to the Mitakshara,⁴ reunion is restricted to three classes of cases, namely, (1) between father and son, (2) between brothers, (3) between paternal uncle and nephews.⁵ The same view is taken in the Smriti Chandrika,⁶ the Dayabhaga,⁷ the Viramitrodaya,⁸ and the Mayukha.⁹ The Mithila school permits any of the late co-sharers to reunite.¹⁰

An agreement to reunite cannot apparently be made by, or on behalf of, a minor.¹¹
